when it arose to the ceiling.
You may open the doors leading from the Hall. Instead of the atmosphere that is pressed in here by the fan being forced into the Hall, it is drawn into the Hall and creates draughts. The whole system is apparently defective. We have now before us several scientists, one of whom has given the matter his attention for the last fifteen years, and proposes to submit to us a written statement of the defect of the present system of ventilation and a proposition for a remedy. Something must be done and done immediately; and my own belief is that it should be done even if the cost is very large, and if the necessary improvement should involve a radical change in the arrangements of the Hall.

The ventilation now is utterly defective. But I think I can state that in a few days something will come of the deliberations of the subcommittee of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Mr. SAYLER. I only desire to call the attention of gentlemen of

Mr. SAYLER. I only desire to call the attention of gentlemen of that committee and of the House to the fact that two or three years ago, I do not remember precisely when, the Senate effected an improvement in the ventilation of their Hall. They did it by a very simple process. It consisted largely in increasing the size of the apertures in the upper portion of the building, and by providing a means of heating and driving out the air which, being condensed by coming in contact with the cold air above, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Harrison] has suggested, falls back into the Hall. The process was simple, and the cost very little. process was simple, and the cost very little.

I have no great opinion of scientific ventilation. I agree very largely with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] upon that question. But it seems to me that if the simple process adopted by the Senate, which is giving that body a comparatively pure atmosphere, were adopted in this House it would accomplish the purpose desired and would cost very little mouey.

Mr. HARRISON. The opinion of persons who have examined this room is that the impurities do not come into this room from without, but are wholly generated in the House from the presence of members and of the large body of the public who come here daily to listen to our deliberations. I would also suggest that we need something more than is required in the Senate, where the mass of persons in attendance is so much less than in this Hall.

Mr. SAYLER. I understand from very good authority that we have been in the habit, within the last two or three years, of having the combined fumes of the kitchen down stairs, now occupied by Mr.

Freund, pumped into the atmosphere of this Hall.
Mr. HARRISON. That is not the fact at all.
Mr. SAYLER. It was last year.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, as I heard the resolution read, it seems to give absolute power to the committee to do whatever they please, without consulting anybody and without responsibility to anybody. There can be, of course, no objection to acting upon this subject now; indeed, it is our duty to do it. But the committee, whatever their conclusions may be, ought to be required to report to the House what they propose, and should have liberty to report at any moment. I hope the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] will modify his resolution in that respect.

Mr. Speaker, the difficulty in the ventilation of this Hall is that there never comes into it one particle of natural light or air. system of ventilation here is simply science against nature. We can never have a good atmosphere until there shall be made a change so radical as to bring this Chamber itself into direct communication with the air and the light of nature. I have no further suggestions to make; but I hope that whatever measures may be agreed on by the committee—and I agree that some measures ought to be taken at once—will be submitted to the House before final adoption, so that we may have an opportunity to consider their efficacy.

Mr. KASSON. I shall be very glad to modify in any particular to meet the wishes of the House the mere form of the resolution. The power which it proposes to confer upon the committee relates only to the immediate direction that might be given in regard to existing arrangements, such as the opening of these upper doors all night so as to give as free a circulation of air as possible, or the removing of accumulations of filth under our desks, near where the currents of air come in, or the removal of alleged impurities in the pipes through which the air is conducted into the House. This class of directions, I contemplated in my resolution, the committee should have authority to carry into effect at once.

Touching any radical change in the system of ventilation, I agree entirely with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] that the matter should be, and I have no doubt would be, first reported to the House. If the resolution is susceptible of any other construction I agree that it ought to be modified; but with this explanation of its meaning I suppose it may safely be adopted; for there is no doubt the committee will confine themselves to the regulation of details for the purpose of temporary improvement under the existing system. Any more permanent improvement, involving a change in the present system, would of course require the action of the House. If, however, it be thought important to change the form of the resolution, let it be done. I ask only that immediate means be taken for temporary relief at least, and that more deliberate measures be taken for permanent relief, in order to save what there is left of health among members on this floor.

Mr. WHITE. I do not think this question can be settled here in this House. For three weeks I have attempted to get the floor on Monday to speak of this very question. I have utterly failed; I failed resterday. I am glad this morning to be able to say just a word in regard to this matter. Before doing so, I ask the Clerk to read a part of an article that appeared in the New York Tribune some weeks ago in relation to this subject.

of an article that appeared in the New York Tribune some weeks ago in relation to this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

The method of heating the Capitol may be briefly described: In the subbasement of the House wing are placed engines which drive immense fun-wheels. These draw in pure air from out doors and force it over coils of pipe heated by steam, and by this means its temperature is properly raised. Thence the air is forced into the Chamber, lobbies, and committee-rooms, while by means of an exhaust fan an attempt is made to remove the foul air through openings in the top of the Chamber. Of the steam coils mentioned, there are twenty-six or twenty-seven, each of which is placed in the brick inclosure, and the most of these are in separate rooms or vanits. Each of these inclosures has from three to five east-iron doors, which, when opened, allow free communication between the air in the room or vault in which it is situ ated and that passing over the steam-coils. These doors are all supposed to be kept closed, in order to prevent any dead air in the vault from passing in and mixing with that supposed to be pure which is passing over the coils. A recent examination of these doors showed that fifty-one of them were so warped or sprung by the heat as to make them far from air-tight. The apertures caused by these imperfections in width vary from the thickness of a sheet of paper to half an inch. The vaults in which these inclosures are situated have been used as store-rooms, in which all sorts of rubbish have been deposited. One of them was a kind of paint-shop, in which turpentine, oils, paint, &c., were stored. In another, several coils of old rubber hose, very moldy and fillity, had been deposited, besides several barriels containing tallow and other similar articles. The temperature in these rooms averages from ninety-five to one hundred and fifty degrees, and, of course, the stending from this rubbish was in some cases very offensive. The gases generated from it passed through openings left by the im

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I sit in the rear of the Hall, and in respect to this matter of ventilation I labor under double disadvantage, though members similarly situated have doubtless noticed the inconvenience as much as myself. In addition to the current of cold air coming in at the rear of our seats, it will be seen from the article which has been read that we have poisonous fumes pumped up to us which has been read that we have poisonous fumes pumped up to us from below. This is a lamentable fact.

In connection with other gentlemen I had the pleasure, or displeasure, of going down into the subbasement and there seeing what is brought up into this room for us to breathe. That kitchen is a perfect stench-hole. I do not refer to the lunch-room, for I am as much in favor of a lunch-room for this House as any other member upon this floor; but when the House is asked to have a great national hotel in the Capitol, I for one protest when I am to suffer from the inconvenience. The stench of the slops in this kitchen, the poisonous fumes from the sinks connected with it, are all pumped up into this House for us to breathe. If members will take it upon themselves for half an hour to go down and see what we have brought up for for half an hour to go down and see what we have brought up for our health, or ill-health, they will not hesitate a moment to apply the remedy. They will not hesitate, I think, to wipe out that kitchen in the subbasement; to wipe out all of those rooms; have the whole place cleaned out and whitewashed, so that the engineer may be able to pump up pure air for us to breathe.

It is true that the ventilation is bad, and it may not be possible for us to provide the remedy at once, but we can at once remove all these foul poisonous holes in the subbasement, so as to provide for a better supply of air or to prevent the air that we have from being vitiated. I for one will make that motion, and if the House shall see fit and vote it down I will suffer on to the end like the other members.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield for an amend-

Mr. KASSON. I could not hear what it was.

Mr. WHITE. I will send it to the Clerk's desk to be read. The gentleman may object to it if he likes, but the number of members who are sick demands something should be done at once to preserve our lives from this foul air. We suffer as much on this side as they do on the other side, so that we are all interested in applying the remedy

Resolved. That hereafter whenever any member is asking a question—

[Shouts of laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. I beg pardon, that is not the resolution.
Mr. CONGER. I think there is no objection to having that read, through. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. That is not the resolution; read the other one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be removed from the subbasement of the House of Representatives the kitchen and all substances which emit foul gases; and he is instructed to purify the chambers and recesses of the subbasement and improve the system of ventilating this Hall: Provided, That this resolution shall not be construed so as to prohibit the keeping of a lunch-room on the basement floor.

Mr. KASSON. I can hardly agree, and I think the House can hardly agree, to so radical a proposition; but let it be referred to the committee for consideration. I yield now for a moment, not-desiring to detain the House, to a member from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who has been examining the subject; and then, if the House is so disposed, I will call for a vote on the resolution. Mr. YOUNG. I think a brief statement as chairman of the subcommittee to which this subject was referred may save "the time of the House and avoid a good deal of unnecessary discussion. It may possibly have escaped the recollection of the House that some days ago a resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to devise proper measure for thorough ventilation of this Hall. That resolution was referred to a subcommittee which has had the matter under investigation for a number of days. We have had the atmosphere of the Hall analyzed by an expert. The Surgeon-General of the Army has made a thorough examination of the Hall and of the passages below and a number of other gentlemen have been called to aid the committee in the investigation and have made their reports. The subcommittee are preparing their report now, based upon information they have derived from all these gentlemen who have made this examination. That report will be submitted to the House for their consideration within a day or two, and I suggest further action on this matter be postponed until that report shall be received, and then the House can go on and adopt such course as may be deemed proper under the circumstances. I therefore move, if I have the floor, that the resolution be laid upon the table or that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds

Mr. KASSON. I have not yielded the floor for a motion, but only to hear what the gentleman had to say; and, as I see the gentleman from Texas is upon his feet, if he desires to say anything I will yield the floor to him.

Mr. REAGAN. I trust that the subcommittee referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee will take steps to stop the draught of cold air coming in under our feet.

Mr. YOUNG. The subcommittee have been examining that sub-

Mr. KELLEY. I suggest, as a temporary expedient, the opening of some of the doors in the galleries—not of the diplomatic gallery or the reporters' gallery—but that the doors of some of the other galleries be opened. As I understand, the poison in the atmosphere drops toward the floor, and we here upon the floor take in the poison generated throughout the Hall. If a draught could be created above our heads—I do not ask that it be arranged permanently, but only to try the experiment for a day or two, or for a few hours-it might give us temporary relief.

Mr. KASSON. In answer to what the gentleman from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has said, I do not see there is any reason for his declining to act under a resolution which merely gives that whole committee the power to provide for our immediate relief.

I hope the committee will not decline a duty which I think ought I hope the committee will not decline a duty which I think ought to be imposed on somebody, but will direct some immediate relief, such as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] suggests or such as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] suggests, and will then take all the time they want for the correction of the system of ventilation generally. That is the only object of this resolution, and I think there can be no objection to it. I hope it may be adopted, and that before we leave the Hall to-day the committee may direct the Doorkeeper in some of the particulars which have been alluded to.

Mr. YOUNG. I was not in the Hall when the resolution of the gen-the Doorkeeper in some of the particulars which have been alluded to.

Mr. YOUNG. I was not in the Hall when the resolution of the gentleman from Iowa was read, and have not a clear idea what it is. I would be glad to have it reported again.
The resolution was again read.
Mr. YOUNG. That resolution is expressed in almost the precise terms of the resolution already before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I have no objection, however, to this resolution being adopted. And I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that the committee will probably report to-morrow morning the result of their investigation.

Mr. KASSON. I shall be very glad if they do so; but I hope that if the other resolution had no effect in getting temporary relief this As I suppose no one wishes further debate, I ask the previous

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof Mr. Kasson's resolution was adopted.

OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. SPARKS. I am instructed by the majority of the Committee on Indian Affairs to ask unanimous consent of the House at this time to report, as a substitute for sundry bills referred to that committee, a bill to transfer the office of Indian Affairs from the Interior Department to the War Department, and to ask that the bill, with the report and testimony, be printed, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made a special order for Saturday next after the morning hour.

The bill (H. R. No. 2677) was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will make an exception in favor of bills from the Appropriation Committee. It is desirable that other special orders should not interfere with the pending ing appropriation bill.

Mr. HANCOCK. I believe there has been a bill on the same subject reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. I would suggest whether it would not be better to set this bill down for hearing at the same time as the other bill has been set down for hearing, that they may be considered together. It has been suggested that there is a question of jurisdiction as between two committees. If both bills are brought before the House for consideration at the same time, that question will cease to be of any material importance. know the day fixed for the consideration of the bill from the Military Committee, but I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sparks] will agree that this shall be considered at the same time.

Mr. SPARKS. Let this be fixed for consideration on Saturday week, and the other can be considered with it.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the other bill was made a special order for Thursday week.

Mr. COOK. Two weeks from Thursday.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move that the consideration of this bill be fixed.

for the same day to which the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs has been assigned.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois accept the proposition?

Mr. SPARKS. I would prefer to have the bill considered at an earlier day. It strikes me that it is important that it should be considered very early. I see that the report of a bill on this subject was made yesterday from the Committee on Indian Affairs. I read from the Record. I presume what is meant is the Committee on Military Affairs. The Committee on Indian Affairs have been acting during the whole session upon this subject, and have carefully taken testimony upon it, in which both sides have been represented, those favoring the transfer and those opposing it. This mass of testimony which I report presents the case. A report was made yesterday from the Committee on Military Affairs. It seems to me that the Committee on Indian Affairs ought certainly to have the charge of this matter, and they have reported by a majority in favor of making this transfer by a substitute which I suppose would not be objectionable to the gentle-men who favor the transfer. I would like to have the consideration of it set for an earlier day than next Thursday two weeks. There are other members of the committee who may perhaps desire to say something on the subject; for my own part, I do not like to consent to the proposition of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CONGER. I do not understand what is the day proposed for the consideration of this subject.

The SPEAKER. Several days have been proposed.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest that this bill from the Committee on Indian Affairs be considered at the same time with the one from the Committee on Military Affairs. This will avoid any danger of confusion by a dispute as to where the jurisdiction belongs.

Mr. SPARKS. That is Thursday two weeks, which is too far on.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it was Thursday of next week. Let the Clerk refer to the Journal.

Mr. SPARKS. I read from the RECORD, which states that the bill was made a special order for two weeks from Thursday next.

Mr. PAGE. There appears to be a question of jurisdiction as to which committee shall have control of this bill. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the subject of the transfer of the Indians from the Interior to the War Department, have had this matter under consideration for the last two months or more. A subcommittee of that committee have been taking testimony, which is very voluminous, and I think it but fair that the House should now determine which committee of the House should have jurisdiction over the transfer of the Indians from the Interior to the War Depart-

Mr. RANDALL. That is what we want to avoid by arranging that the two bills shall come up together; that there may be no favoritism or distinction made between the two committees.

Each of these committees has sought to obtain a great deal of information, which varies somewhat, but in the aggregate is very essential to the proper understanding of the subject.

Mr. PAGE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to whom the floor would be awarded on Thursday, the day the special order comes up? It seems to me there would be a conflict between two committees, and as this is a question of jurisdiction it seems to me that the House should determine this morning on the jurisdiction of the two committees

Mr. BANNING. I think there is no trouble as to the jurisdiction in this case. The Committee on Military Affairs have had this bill under consideration, and have taken a great deal of testimony which is now in the hands of the printer.

Mr. SPARKS. The Committee on Military Affairs have not had under consideration the bill which the Committee on Indian Affairs had under consideration.

Mr. BANNING. I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Military Affairs have had under consideration a bill to transfer the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department. They have taken a great deal of testimony which is now in the hands of the printer, being printed for the information of the House

As to the question of jurisdiction, I think there will be no difficulty. I know there is no member of the Military Committee who has any other wish in this matter than that the best interests of the Indians and the country shall be reached, and that this bill shall become a law at the earliest possible day.

Mr. SCALES. Was it not agreed on a conference between the two committees that the bills should be presented together?

Mr. BANNING. No, sir; we agreed to consider the bills in the House together. I told the gentleman that I was willing that the bill which his committee would report should be considered on the same day with the bill reported by the Military Committee.

However I have only one word to say upon that matter, and it is that, if the House sees fit to consider the bill reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs at an earlier day than the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and adopt it, it shall receive my hearty approval, and will receive the approval, I believe, of the Committee on Military Affairs.

It seems to me only right that the House, in considering these two bills, should have before it all the information and testimony that have been gathered by both committees, so that it may be fully informed on this subject. The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill first more than two weeks ago, that report having been lost. The committee reported again yesterday, and fixed two weeks from Thursday next for the consideration of the bill, so that the Indian Committee might report also and the House be fully informed on the subject.

The time fixed for the consideration of this bill by the Military Committee yesterday will only be sufficient for printing the testimony and getting the reports before the House. I would suggest to the gentlemen that we consider their bill at the same time, but if that is not pleasing to them let them fix a time, and the Committee on Military Affairs will give all the assistance they can to make their bill

Mr. SPARKS. I would state that when we learned in the Committee on Indian Affairs that the Committee on Military Affairs had this subject under consideration, the Committee on Indian Affairs were about to instruct by some resolution the chairman of that committee to make some report upon it in the House. As chairman of the sub-committee I prevented that by the suggestion that I would see the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and thought we could make some satisfactory arrangement of the matter. I made this arrangement with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs: that they should take no steps toward introducing their bill or reporting any bill to the House without full and complete consultation with us. In view of the fact that both committees agreed upon the propriety of the transfer of this Bureau to the War Department, I thought that some general bill satisfactory to both committees might be prepared; at that time an agreement in substance was entered into with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. To my surprise, sir, on Saturday an attempt was made to introduce this bill and it was objected to, and yesterday, while the Committee on Indian Affairs were in session and came into the House somewhat late, we found that this bill had been reported. My opinion is that it was an exhibition of very bad faith, and I want here distinctly to state that opinion. In corroboration of this statement, I know that the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE,] who is a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs and who had a conference with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, will corroborate what I have said upon the subject.

Now, I want no conflict with respect to the consideration of this ill. The country have been impressed with the idea that the Committee on Indian Affairs have charge of this matter. That committee has taken a considerable mass of testimony in opposition to this transfer, as well as a great deal in favor of it. As a member of the majority in favor of the measure, I feel that the views of those who are opposed to the transfer should be considered fairly in the House as well as those in favor of it, so as to give a full and complete showing on this question, and there cannot be any if it is correctly understood. The simple question as to the transfer of the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department is whether it is for the sake of the Indians or for the sake of the War Department. If it be for the sake of the Indians, then the matter properly belongs to the Committee on Indian Affairs. If it be for the sake of the Army and for the sake of the War Department, then it belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs. Now upon that point I contend there can be no question.

This whole matter has come up and the whole interest of the question hinges upon what is the best method of treating the Indians. Therefore the whole matter belongs to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I submit that the original reference of this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs was under a misapprehension of the House and by a mistake. While the matter was under consideration by the Comby a mistake. mittee on Indian Affairs, and after the Committee on Indian Affairs had been for two months taking testimony on both sides of the question, and just as they are ready to make their report, this bill is sprung upon the House, contrary, I must say, to the very distinct understanding which the Committee on Indian Affairs had received from the Committee on Military Affairs. I insist upon it that the question properly belongs only to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and as such their bill is reported this morning and demands the attention of the House under their direction.

Mr. COOK. Gentlemen on the other side of this question seem to be inclined to indulge, whether according to strict parliamentary nsage or not I will not say, in charging other gentlemen here with acting in bad faith. Now I want to state a fact in relation to this A bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, introduced by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. Hancock,] who is not a member of that committee. He introduced the bill and had it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It came before that committee without any application on their part, and without any suggestion from them that they wanted it before them. They found the bill before them, and they considered it. More than two weeks ago—and I call attention of gentlemen to that fact—more than two weeks ago I was instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report the bill to the House, and I did so, and it was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

That bill was lost, mislaid, or destroyed, in the Clerk's office, in some way which they could not account for. We prepared another bill, and attempted to report it as a substitute for the bill which had been lost. That bill has been in my hands for six or eight days, and I have been waiting an opportunity to comply with the instructions of the Committee on Military Affairs, to report it as a substitute for the other bill and to ask that a day be fixed for its consideration. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Sparks] came to me last Friday-[to Mr. SPARKS]—give me your attention for a moment.
Mr. SPARKS. I will.

Mr. SPARKS. I will.

Mr. COOK. The gentleman came to me last Friday and asked me for the bill which he said he understood I had from the Committee on Military Affairs. I gave it to him, but told him I wanted to report it, and he said he would return it to me the next morning. When I called on him the next day for it, he said, "I promised to return it to you to-day, and I will do so." I said, "I want to report it, as I am instructed to do by the Committee on Military Affairs, and I propose to do so the first time I am recognized by the Speaker."

Said he: "The chairman of your committee told me he would not Propose to do so the first time I am recognized by the Speaker."

Said he: "The chairman of your committee told me he would not have this bill reported." I replied: "As I understand it, the chairman has nothing to do with it. I am instructed by the committee to report it, and I have been seeking an opportunity to do so for the last six or eight days." I ask him, and I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Seelye] to remember, and the Record will show it, that more than two weeks ago I reported a bill on this subject, and therefore we have not done the thing in hot haste.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?
Mr. COOK. Certainly.
Mr. SPARKS. It has been truly stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cook] that I asked to look at his bill, and promised to return it to him the next day. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. COOK. That is correct.

Mr. SPARKS. And I returned it to him as soon as I came into the Hall, for I had my overcoat and cane in my hand, having just entered the Hall, when I returned it to him. When he said to me that he wanted to report it to the House, I said to him that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs had entered into an agreement with me not to have that done.

Mr. COOK. I so stated; and I told the gentleman that the chairman could make no such agreement.

Mr. SPARKS. I said that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs had entered into such an agreement.

Mr. COOK. I so stated; and I said to the gentleman that the Committee on Military Affairs had instructed me to report the bill to the House, and I should do so the first opportunity.

Mr. SEELYE. The point raised by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cook] is not vital to the question, although in reference to that point I understand the matter exactly as it has been presented by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] my colleague on the Committee on Indian Affairs. The vital question here is whether this matter of the transfer of the Indians to the War Department belongs properly to the Committee on Indian Affairs or primarily to the Committee on Military Affairs. The House has referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs two bills upon this subject and resolutions of the Legislature of California bearing upon the subject. By what I conceive to have been a misapprehension one bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee, as I am informed, has taken testimony exclusively upon one side of the question.

Mr. COOK. Not at all. The gentleman has been misinformed.

Mr. SEELYE. If so, then I am happy to be corrected. The Committee on Indian Affairs have been engaged in carefully maturing their bill and in taking testimony upon the subject, and they now report their bill to the House, together with the testimony and a minority report, and ask the attention of the House to the subject. I submit that if the House understands the question, there can be no difference of opinion in regard to it.

Mr. BANNING. Mr. Speaker, I do not know why this bill more roperly belongs to the Indian Committee than to the Committee on Military Affairs. Mr. SEELYE. Will the gentleman allow me to state a single point?

Mr. BANNING. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor.
Mr. SEELYE. Will the gentleman allow me to state—
Mr. BANNING. Not at this time. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Indian Committee knows better than the Military Committee whether the War Department is ready to take charge of this

Mr. SEELYE. Will the gentleman allow me a single inquiry? Mr. BANNING. I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to say one word as to what I have said and done in regard to this matter. I have seen no occasion from the beginning to the end for any jealousy between the two committees. I hope to see this transfer made, because I believe it is for the best. When the gentleman came and spoke to me, I told him that we could consider the bill in the House together. We can do that now; we can consider his bill or our bill; I do not care which. More than two weeks ago we perfected a bill in the Military Committee, sent it here, and after it was reported to the House, but before it had been acted upon, it was lost. After that time I had an interview with the gentleman. Then after our bill was perfected, I went to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Cook,] in whose hands it was, and asked him to give it to the gentleman, in order that he might consider it in connection with his own bill. Then we reported our bill to the House; it is here now. It has been postponed for two weeks to allow ample opportunity for examining it and to give time for printing all the testimony for the information of the House, and the gentleman to make his report.

The gentleman says we have taken no testimony against this transfer. We have taken the testimony of Army officers who are conversant with the matter; we have taken the testimony of Mr. Welsh, who has been so largely concerned in the management of the Indians, who has considered the subject well and thoroughly, and who has been greatly interested in it, as a Christian and philanthropist. have put that testimony in the hands of the printer, so that it may all be brought here for the information of the House. Has the gen-

Now, sir, I say in regard to the consideration of this bill, let the time be fixed sufficiently ahead to have all the testimony printed, and if the bill reported by the gentleman is one better prepared or more desirable to be passed than the one we have presented, it shall receive my hearty support; and the Committee on Military Affairs will not find any fault that the Indian Committee have succeeded in framing and the state of the control of the ing the interest of the Indians ought to come before us. This question did come before us, and we have considered it. I have no objection to the action by the other committee. I care not how many committees may consider the subject; I care not how maturely the question may be examined. For this proposition to transfer the Indian Bureau from one Department to another is certainly a very important

But I call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that while we are squabbling here as to the jurisdiction of these two committees the Committee on Appropriations have stepped in and taken control of this question. In the general appropriation bill, already reported, they propose the transfer of all this matter to the War Department. Now, in order to enable us to consider this question as it should be considered, in order that all the information which we ought to have upon a matter of this importance may be before the House and the country, I think we ought to appoint an early day for the considera-tion of this bill. In that appropriation bill the transfer is made. That bill is now under consideration; it is before the House. But no testimony, none of the necessary information, so far as I know, is before the House. What I ask the House to do is to fix as early a day as possible—
Mr. BANNING. Do you think that your testimony can be printed and brought back to the House at an earlier day than that already

Mr. SCALES. We do. We think our testimony can be printed and brought back by Wednesday week or Thursday week at furthest. And the consideration of this question ought to be hurried up. The members of this House want that information; the country wants it, and we cannot overestimate the importance of the question. That being the case, I insist that we should fix the carliest possible day; and while we are considering this appropriation bill let us consider this bill which is the great phicar to place in that bill this bill which is the great subject embraced in that bill.

Mr. SEELYE. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Banning] wished to know why this matter belonged to the Committee on Indian Affairs rather than to the Committee on Military Affairs. I before endeavored to state the reason; it can be put into a single phrase: simply because the matter primarily has reference to the interests of the Indians and has not reference primarily to the interests of the Army. If the question shall be decided by the House favorably to the transfer, then of course it will belong to the Committee on Military Affairs to provide for competent agencies to carry out the measure. But the exact question in the first place is whether the transfer should be made; and that involves the question whether the change is to be made in the interest of the Indian or for the sake of the Army. I say it is for the sake of the Indian we are considering this question; and upon that there is no dispute. Nobody pretends to claim that the first question here is for the sake of the Army. Nobody pretends to say the first point is what is the interest of the War Department, but what is the interest of the Indian? If we decide the interest of the Indian requires this transfer, then of course the Committee on Military Affairs are to bring in the necessary means to get if through.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts does not present the issue quite as comprehensively as the facts would warrant. I do not think the inquiry is limited as to whether the object of the bill is the interest of the Indian or the interest of the War Department. That occurs to me to be rather an unfair statement of the question under consideration. The object of this bill I hope is in the interest of the people and of the Government of the United States.

I had the privilege, by the permission of the House, of preparing a bill on this subject to which I have given some attention. And it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and for these reasons: The change contemplated devolves new duties upon the officers of the Army. It requires certain duties to be performed by the military proper.

Mr. SEELYE. Let me ask the gentleman a question, and that is, whether these duties could be devolved upon the officers of the Army unless the transfer were previously authorized?

Mr. HANCOCK. That is a very proper inquiry, but it is a question to be disposed of by the House and not by either committee.

I understand the gentleman's position to be opposed to this transfer, and if the House shall agree with him, of course it will reject the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs; but if, on the other hand, the House shall agree to this transfer, then, according to his own position, he as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs will have no further duty in connection with it. It then becomes a question properly referable to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The primary question is not one particularly depending on the action of the committee at all, but upon the view the majority of members may take as to the propriety of the transfer being made. In that I presume in the main members will satisfy themselves without material assistance or interference on the part of either of the

Now, Mr. Speaker, that being conceded, and I think my friend from Massachusetts will not controvert the correctness of it, the next inquiry is as to the duty which devolves upon the one or the other committee having that measure in charge.

Take it for granted that the House will agree to this transfer, because it seems to be pretty generally conceded upon all sides that the transfer had better be made, and that being conceded the inquiry is of course who can better determine the duty to be performed by the respective branches of the Army. The object in drawing this bill was to take it as far as possible away from all political connection, and by an amendment, which I presume was reported, there is no special bureau with which it is to be connected altogether in the War Office. The duties are to be performed by officers of the Army, and special duties are assigned to officers of a particular rank and jurisdiction.

Another branch of the duty devolves upon the Quartermaster's Department. I believe that the Committee on Military Affairs are familiar with the organization of the Army and the ability of the respective branches of that Army, and are better qualified to determine how and in what manner these various duties can be performed than any other committee.

Another branch of service in connection with the Indians is to be performed by the Commissary Department of the Army. Assuredly it is the province of the Committee on Military Affairs to determine that point.

Another service is to be performed by the Pay Department of the Army, a branch of the service especially within the jurisdiction and under the supervision and direction of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these are details of the bill necessary to be provided which can be done better by the Military Committee than by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

However, it seems to me the inquiry is of little practical utility as to which one of these committees has stronger grounds for jurisdiction. They have both acted and the result of their action is before the House. My proposition in the outset was that the two reports might be set down for consideration upon the same day. One or the other of the bills might then be adopted by the House as the one or the other might seem best calculated to carry into effect the objects sought to be accomplished. A good deal of testimony has been taken, I think, by both committees, constituting a book of matter which will require considerable time to look through. This bill reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, with a divided committee, with a majority and minority report, would seem to warrant indulgence of sufficient time at least for each and every member to familiarize himself with the reasons assigned pro and con.

Now I do not think there is any such great emergency as would warrant hasty action on a question of such grave importance both to the Indian and to the whole people of the United States.

Mr. PAGE. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Texas that in

Mr. PAGE. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Texas that in the legislative appropriation bill, now in Committee of the Whole, the Committee on Appropriations have recommended the transfer of the management of Indian affairs from the Interior to the War Department.

Mr. HANCOCK. I have been absent for some days and am not aware of all that has been before the House, but I do not see how any embarrassment arises from what the gentleman from California has stated. At any rate, this is a question which I would dislike to see hurriedly or superficially considered. It is one which I have considered a good deal myself. I know that there are difficulties connected with it. I wish, therefore, to give the very best consideration to the subject, both for the sake of the people of this country and of the Indians; and hence I made the motion that the consideration of the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs be postponed until the day fixed for the consideration of the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

on Military Affairs.

Mr. RANDALL. I regret what I may term the premature agitation and discussion of this question; but as allusion has been made to the action of the Committee on Appropriations, it is proper for me to state the grounds upon which that committee were required to deal with this question. The plain question was presented to the committee whether they would make an appropriation for the next fiscal year to the Indian Bureau of the Interior Department, where the management of the Indian service now rests. The question had been agitated whether this transfer should be made; therefore when we approached the appropriation for the Indian Bureau we deemed it proper to look squarely in the face this question. But before dealing with it the members of the Committee on Appropriations sought advice and information. We obtained the information that both the committees that were then considering the subject were, by a majority of their respective members, in favor of this transfer. We therefore submitted the question to the Committee on Appropriations for a vote whether we should appropriate any money for the Indian Bureau with the Interior Department during the next fiscal year.

Now, mark you, the transfer of the Indian service to the War Department necessitates no additional Bureau whatever in the War Department. The service now performed by the Bureau on Indian Affairs in the Department of the Interior can be dispensed with, and all that service performed by officers of the Army upon the pay which they now receive; so that in that respect the amount of money expended where it now is in maintaining a Bureau can be entirely saved.

now receive; so that in that respect the amount of money expended where it now is in maintaining a Bureau can be entirely saved.

Let me refer to another point. We in no manner sought to interfere with what might be called a detailed bill for the management of Indian affairs. By an examination of the amendment which the Committee on Appropriations have reported it will be seen that, while the transfer is made so that the Indian service can be thoroughly and efficiently and honestly performed by the War Department and by the Army officers, the amendment in no respect interferes with any subsequent legislation proposed by these committees as to the details of the management. In our amendment we leave—which I believe to be proper for the first year—this transfer discretionary as to its arrangement according to such rules and regulations as the President of the United States may deem necessary; so that there is in fact, by the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations providing for the transfer, a flexibility, as I may name it, of administration which I believe would be conducive to harmony in the service.

I believe would be conducive to harmony in the service.

Now, one other point. The committee, with singular unanimity, reached the conclusion, with the majority of the other two committees, that this transfer should be made. And I say to the House, so far as we were able to learn, the Indian will not only not suffer by the transfer, but will be enormously benefited by an administration more secure and honest than that which has existed in the Interior

Under the act of March 3, 1849, which organized the Interior Department, the transfer was made in as few words as it is made by the amendment which we have offered, and that discretion, as far as I can remember—it is some days since I read the law—that discretion which we propose to give the President of the United States under our amendment was accorded to the Secretary of the Interior in that law. We have, therefore, so arranged it in the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations that this transfer can stand upon its own feet and go forward; and if the Committee on Indian Affairs or the Committee on Military Affairs or the House and the Senate shall deem that further legislation in connection with the details and management of Indian Affairs is necessary, well and good.

As one of the results of this transfer, the expenses of the superintendents of Indian affairs, the agents, and the interpreters to the agencies can all be saved to the Government by assigning idle military officers to those duties. In addition, the civilization of the Indian, which costs for the current fiscal year when it shall be completed about a million of dollars, can be provided for under the administra-tion of the War Department for half the money, and the work done quite as well. Then, in addition to that million of dollars, or about a million of dollars, which can be saved and no injury whatever done to the Indian, we will at the proper time propose that these extreme outposts shall be drawn in. It has been suggested that two new military posts shall be established, one at the mouth of the Big Horn River, where it runs into the Yellowstone, and another on the Rosebud River. Both can be reached by navigation, which will do away with the necessity of keeping up six or eight other military posts which are extremely far away and approachable only by wagon—Fort Laramie, Fort McPherson, Fort Ellis, Fort Steele, and some others. Now, an immense saving to the Government comes in there in connection with the transportation of the commodities necessary to sustain the Indians; and we believe with General Sheridan in his testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs, that in the course of a year, or two years at the outside, three and a half millions of dollars can be saved to the Government in this connection in the management of Indian affairs.

I have never yet been able to have an intelligent contradiction to

I have never yet been able to have an intelligent contradiction to the proposition that when Army supplies are being distributed to the Army, why at the same time Indian supplies could not be distributed to the Indians.

These officers are governed by military laws; they are susceptible of prompt punishment if they fail faithfully to perform their duties; and I must say here deliberately that a man in the Army who is dishonest is the dishonorable exception, and that it is seldom in my experience that I have seen such a case in the Army. Where an Army officer has committed fraud or perpetrated wrong, he is subjected to immediate punishment. How many Indian agents I would like to immediate punishment. How many Indian agents, I would like to ask, who have committed frauds, have been punished at all? That is one reason which I had in favor of this transfer. Why, sir, every deficiency bill brings up proof after proof as to the manner in which the Indians are robbed in every direction. It is a strange instance where an Indian agent is punished for injuries committed on the Indians; that is one reason which stands to my mind irresistibly as an argument in favor of this transfer. Another point which makes me favor this transfer is that millions of dollars can be saved in the matter of transportation in connection with the Indian business

Mr. BANNING. So much has been said about this matter belonging to the Committee on Indian Affairs under the rules of the House, that I ask that the rule of the House governing the Committee on Indian Affairs be read for the information of the House, and I hope that gentlemen will give their attention to its reading.

Mr. SEELYE. We have read it several times in our committee. The Clerk read as follows:

There shall be appointed at the commencement of each Congress a Committee on Indian  $\Delta$  flairs, to consist of eleven members. [There are no duties assigned to this committee by the rules.]

The SPEAKER. It is the duty, however, of the Chair to say that the House has assigned duties to this committee, and has the right to do so, and that in the judgment of the Chair this question as to the reading of the rule does not settle this controversy; the House must settle it.

Mr. BANNING. I merely had the rule read for the purpose of showing that when the bill was referred to the Military Committee we were charged with its consideration as well as the gentlemen of the Indian Committee. In considering the bill we have endeavored to perform our duty faithfully. We have considered the bill in all it details; and as it must be carried out by the War Department, the Commissary Department, the Quartermaster-General's Department, and the Paymaster-General's Department, I would like to know if it is not in the province of the Military Committee to consider the bill; and when we come into the House and ask, not that our bill shall be passed before the gentleman's bill, but that the information we have collected shall be published and the two bills considered together, do we ask too much ?

Mr. SEELYE. I have no doubt that the bill reported by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cook] has been very wisely conceived and is a very judicious plan, provided this transfer be ordered by the House. But the exact point which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Banning] seems to overlook is that he has brought before the House a bill makseems to overtook is that he has brought before the House a bill making provision for a transfer which has not yet been considered and which the House has not yet ordered. After it has been considered and after the House has ordered that this transfer shall take place, then I have no doubt that the bill he has presented will be favorably received by the House.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that he received early in-formation that the majority of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs and of the Committee of Indian Affairs were favorable to the transfer. I am quite unable to say how the information respecting the Committee on Indian Affairs reached the gentleman, for I venture to say that that committee did not know themselves until yesterday morning whether a majority was in favor of the transfer or not, and it was only determined at the meeting of that committee, counting all the members present, by a majority of one in favor of the transfer. A minority of the Committee on Indian Affairs, on very full discussion, opposed the transfer, and I hope that the House will pronounce an opinion unfavorable to the transfer. But the exact point here is that the gentleman from Ohio or one of his colleagues on the Military Committee has introduced a bill providing for certain ma-chinery to carry out a course of action not yet considered or adopted by the House

Mr. CONGER. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the resolution reported by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means on January 5 for the distribution to the different committees of the subject-matters involved in the President's message and accompanying documents.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That so much of said message and documents as refers to Indian affairs e referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, by that resolution all that part of the President's message relating to Indian affairs, and all the portions of the reports of the officers of the Department connected with the management of Indian affairs and all matters relating thereto, were, by a vote of the House, as soon as the committees were appointed, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Of course, as we all know, the subject-matter of this transfer was considered as among these reports, And very properly that committee, by order of the House, should take into consideration and were required to take into consideration all the subjects, as well what was contained in the message as in the other papers and documents connected with Indian affairs

It is immaterial to me what committee may report upon this subject. I desire this only, that the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs with the proof, as well as the report of the Committee on Military Affairs with their proof, may be printed and laid before the House a sufficient length of time before the day for their considera-tion to enable members to give at least a fair hearing and consideration to the subject. I desire to take no part in this matter, except to call the attention of the House to the fact that the earliest and fullest submission of all these matters was made to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and it was submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs only incidentally and, perhaps, by mistake.

Mr. COX. The House is in this predicament: We have two committees, both of which have been charged by order of the House with the consideration of the subject of the transfer of Indian affairs to the War Department. Both of these committees have reported in favor of the transfer.

Mr. BANNING. One unanimously and the other divided.
Mr. COX. I think the debate on this subject now is somewhat premature. I would like if possible to hear the discussion upon this subject before we pass upon it in the appropriation bill. The Indian Department has been trying for years to civilize such Indians as the War Department could not kill. That has been going on for years. I think it is in the interest of the Interior Department, with all its paraphernalia of transportation and agencies and its contract system, to keep the Indians alive in order to fleece them; while it is the interest of the War Department, backed up by the men upon the border, to exterminate the Indians, according to a motto which has been very frequently quoted here in the House that "the best Indian is the dead Indian."

I do not wish to pass upon this question immediately. It is a question of economy. The gentleman from Pennsylvania on my right, [Mr. RANDALL,] when the discussion comes up on the appropriation bill and we have reached the last section but one, can tell us wherein the Indian can be protected and wherein we can save money by it. I should like to hear that discussion.

I have remonstrances from men who have had large experience in this Indian business—good men, Christian men, men like Colonel Manypenny, of Ohio, once an Indian commissioner. He is a man of pure character; one who stood by the Indians in former days against the War Department. He sends to me a carefully-prepared written statement in protestation of any transfer of this Indian Bureau to the War Department. I do not desire to pass upon it now. It is a matter for fair discussion, not for premature discussion. It is the interest of the House and of the country, not so much that one committee should have precedence over another as that the whole question should come up in one debate and be disposed of promptly.

Mr. VAN VORHES. Before this subject is finally disposed of, I ask, on behalf of the minority of the standing Committee on Indian Affairs, permission to present a minority report, that it may go with the other and be printed and laid upon the tables of members. I do not wish to be cut off from the right to do so by the previous question, or by any action that may be taken in this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will see that the gentleman is not so cut off. His proposition will be entertained at the proper time.

Mr. VAN VORHES. I wish to say in this connection that I desire to corroborate to the fullest extent what has been said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] in reference to Mr. Manypenny, of Ohio, who was so long an Indian commissioner in this country. gard his evidence to be of the utmost importance, and he is against this proposed transfer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the question now before the House to be upon referring this bill, or the substitute for the sundry bills upon the subject, to the Committee of the Whole House for consideration two weeks from Thursday next, after the morning hour. Does the Chair hear any objection?

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to printing the report and testimony from the majority of the Committee on Indian Affairs together with the minority report of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VAN VOR-

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SPARKS. It is the understanding that the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs shall have precedence?

The SPEAKER. Precedence over what?
Mr. SPARKS. Over the report of the Committee on Military Af-

The SPEAKER. That it shall be regarded as the first in order?

Mr. SPARKS. Yes.
The SPEAKER. Is that agreed to by the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Banning?

Mr. BANNING. I have no objection to it. I have no other wish in this matter than that this bill may become a law. I do not think any member of the Committee on Military Affairs has any other wish in the matter.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection such will be the order. No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other pursuance. commissioners, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 4) for the relief of William Bowlin;

A bill (S. No. 43) granting a pension to Urial Bundy; A bill (S. No. 130) to relinquish the interests of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco, in the State

A bill (S. No. 545) granting a pension to Abraham Ellis; and A joint resolution (S. R. No. 2) authorizing Rear-Admiral John J. Almy, United States Navy, to accept a decoration from the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:
A bill (H. R. No. 215) granting a pension to John G. Parr, of Kittanning, Pennsylvania;

A bill (H. R. No. 1599) granting a pension to Frances C. Elliott; and
A joint resolution (H. R. No. 65) authorizing Edwin James, consular agent at San José, to accept a piece of plate from the Queen of Great Britain.

REAL-ESTATE POOL-RECUSANT WITNESS.

Mr. GLOVER. I am directed by the special committee on the District real-estate pool and Jay Cooke & Co.'s indebtedness to make a report to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire whether this report relates to the question of contumacy on the part of a witness?

Mr. GLOVER. It does, and is therefore a privileged question.

On the 24th day of January, A. D. 1876, the House adopted the following resolu-

On the 24th day of January, A. D. 1876, the House adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas the Government of the United States is a creditor of the firm of Jay Cooke & Co., now in bankruptey, by order and decree of the district court of the United States in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, resulting from the improvident deposits made by the Secretary of the Navy of the United States, with the London branch of said house of Jay Cooke & Co., of the public moneys; and whereas a matter known as the real-estate pool was only partially inquired into by the late joint select committee to inquire into the affairs of the District of Columbia, in which Jay Cooke & Co. had a large and valuable interest; and whereas Edwin M. Lewis, trustee of the estate and effects of said firm of Jay Cooke & Co., has recently made a settlement of the interest of the estate of Jay Cooke & Co., has recently made a settlement of the interest of the estate of Jay Cooke & Co., as it is alleged, of the numerous creditors of said estate, including the Government of the United States; and whereas the courts are now powerless by reason of said settlement to afford adequate redress to said creditors:

"Resolved, That a special committee of five members of this House, to be selected by the Speaker, he appointed to inquire into the nature and history of said real-estate pool and the character of said settlement, with the amount of property involved in which Jay Cooke & Co. were interested, and the amount paid or to be paid in said settlement, with power to send for persons and papers, and report to this House."

Under said resolution the undersigned committee was appointed, and in conformity with the power therein conferred have sent for persons and papers. The committee caused a subpana duces tecum to be issued and duly served on one Hallet Kilbourn, a resident of this District. Said subpana is in the words and figures following, to-wit:

Hallet Kilbourn: We command and strictly enjoin you that, laying aside all manner of business an of Washington, District of Columbia, on Saturday, the 4th day of March, A. D. 1876, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. of said day, to testify what you know in regard to the matters to be inquired of by said committee; and that you also diligently and carefully search for, examine, and inquire after, and bring with you and produce, at the time and place aforesaid, the certain deeds, and deeds of trust declarations of trust, and printed papers referred to therein, relating to the following squares, parts of squares, lots, and parcels of ground, or real property, situate in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, to wit: All the property described in the paper writing hereto attached, marked exhibit A., and made a part of this subpoena; also relating to any other property purchased or sold by you as trustee for either the real-estate pool, in which the firm of Jay Cooke & Co., or Messrs. Stewart, Hilyer & Sunderland, or either of them, had an interest, together with all copies, draugths, and vonchers relating to said documents, and all other documents, letters, and paper writings whatsoever, including bank-books, bills of exchange, bank-checks, stubs of checks, ledgers, blotters, day-books, and other books of accounts, maps, that can or may afford any information or evidence relating to the said matters to be inquired of by said committee, belonging to you or subject to your control, either individually, or as trustee, or as a member of the firm of Kilbourn & Latta.

Herein fail not, and make return of this summons.

Witness my hand and the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States, at the city of Washington, this 28th day of February, A. D. 1876.

Said Kilbourn appeared as a witness before the committee on the 4th day of March, 1876, at ten o'clock a.m.; and, after being duly sworn according to law, was interrogated as follows:

By Mr. NEW:

By Mr. New:

Question. State your name.

Answer. Hallet Kilbourn.
Q. How long have you resided here?

A. About fifteen years.
Q. Are you the Hallet Kilbourn referred to in this subpæna duces tecum?

A. Yes, sir.
Q. What has been your occupation?

A. For ten years I have been in the real-estate business here.
Q. State whether or not Mr. Latta was a partner of yours?

A. Ho is.
Q. You are the same Hallet Kilbourn spoken of and who testified before:

Q. You are the same Hallet Kilbourn spoken of and who testified before a joint committee at the last session of Congress? A. Yes, sir.

O. State whether you have in your possession now and have brought to the com-

Q. State whether you have in your possession now and have brought to the committee-room the papers, documents, memoranda, &c., referred to in the subpæna duces tecum served upon you?

A. I have not.
Q. State whether you are prepared to produce them at this sitting of the committee?

A. I am not prepared to produce them to-day.

Q. State whother you are willing to produce them now or at any future sitting of this committee?

This committee?

A. As at present advised, I am not prepared.

Q. You refuse to produce them before the committee in response to this sub-

Q. Are you still will be state the reasons therefor, my personal reasons. My partner and myself are in a private business. We have no connection with the Government of the United States, and never have had; are conscious of having violated no law; are not charged with any fraud. Our business that we do is done with private citizens throughout the country, and I stand upon the right which I think belongs to every private citizen not accused of violating any law of being protected in his papers. Whatever the law decides, however, I am willing to abide by. I sustain but one relation to the Government, and that is to pay taxes and obey the law. That is the only transaction I have with the Government at all.

Q. Are you still Mr. Latta's partner?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the business relations with reference to these matters heretofore subsisting between you still exist?

A. Yes, sir, except what may have been changed by the transactions of the partnership business, the purchases and sales that have since been made?

By Mr. Lews:

By Mr. Lewis:

Q. When did Mr. Olmstead become a member of this firm? A. He has had a special interest within the last year or two. He is interested in the profits; that is the relation he sustains to it.

By Mr. SMITH:

Q. Do you refuse to answer because you think such answer would criminate you?

A. O, not at all, sir; not at all. If anybody will make an oath, an affirmation, or affidavit that in anything in connection with this we have violated any law, or committed any fraud, we will give you our books, give the whole history of our firm from the day of our baptism until the present time.

HALLET KILBOURN recalled.

By Mr. NEW:

Question, Mr. Kilbourn, before an announcement is made by the committee of Question. Mr. Kilbourn, before an announcement is made by the committee of the conclusion to which they have arrived in reference to the questions raised as to the subpena duces tecum, they desire to ask you some additional questions. I believe you have already stated before this committee that you are a resident of this District, and that your business is that of real-estate agent or real-estate broker? Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you been in that business in this city?

A. A little over ten years, I think.

Q. When did Mr. Latta become your partner?

A. When I commenced business; we commenced in 1865, I think.

Q. When did Mr. Olmstead become a partner?

A. Within a couple of years, according to my recollection.

Q. Are they both still your partners?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Are you acquainted with Henry D. Cooke?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How long have you known him?
A. Well, I think for ten or twelve years.
Q. During what part of that time did Henry D. Cooke reside in this city?
A. I think he has resided here ever since I have known him.
Q. Is he the same Henry D. Cooke who was governor of this District and exofficio president of the board of public works?
A. Yes, sir. I think so.
Q. Was he a member of the banking house of Jay Cooke & Co., lately doing business in this city?
A. I understand he was.
Q. Can you tell about when that banking house began business in this city, and when it ceased to do business here?
A. I cannot tell when it commenced. I think it ceased in September, 1873.
Q. For about what length of time was it in business in this city as a banking house?

house?

A. For ten or twelve years, I should judge; possibly over. I do not know exactly.

Q. State whether you have any knowledge of the existence of what was and is known as the "real-estate pool" in this city, the same referred to by you in testimony given by you before a congressional investigating committee during the first session of the Forty-third Congress.

A. I know all there is about it. I think.

Q. You mean to answer that you have knowledge upon that subject?

A. Yes, sir; I think I know all about it.

Q. Upon page 255 of Senate report of the investigation in which you testified during the last Congress, a letter is referred to in which you are represented as using this language: "Henry D. Cooke has anthorized me to draw on him for $25,000 cash for real-estate pool." I wish you to state to whom that letter was addressed.

A. I think it annears in the testimony them.

e pool? A. We did; or I did, in connection with the other moneys put in for a common

In purchasing real estate for the pool?

Q. In purchasing real estate for the pool?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. When did Jay Cooke & Co. furnish this money? To refresh your recollection, I will say that Mr. Latta testified that it was about August 25, 1871.
A. I think it was in 1871. That is my recollection, that it was along in that year. By Mr. LEWIS:

Q. About the time you wrote that letter to Mr. Huntington?
A. I do not know. I do not know that we had invested any at that time, but probably arrangements were made at that time.

By Mr. NEW:

Q. You think it was in the summer of 1871.

A. Yes, sir. I do not know that it was all expended during 1872, but I presume the arrangement was made, as instated, to use the $25 000.

Q. Was there a fund raised by those who constituted the pool?

A. Certain parties put in a certain amount of money each.

By Mr. Lewis

Q. That constituted a general fund? A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. NEW:

Was this money put in your hands? Yes, sir. Thus constituting what is commonly called a real-estate pool?

How much was thus put into your hands, or the firm of which you were a Member?

A. Of course I have held the right to decline to answer that, and I will not now hesitate to do so. I will detail all the history of this pool to that extent. Five gentlemen each put in $5,000, and Jay Cooke & Co. put in $25,000. Now you have the whole extent of the pool.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. That was the entire sum at any time put in?

A. There was an assessment made after Jay Cooke & Co. failed of $2,000 each to meet payments. Jay Cooke & Co. did not pay this, and these other parties paid $2,000 after. I may say now that is the whole of it. Out of this great, big, world-wide noised-abroad pool, that is the whole sum of money that was ever put in it in the world. By Mr. Lewis:

Q. Was that assessment of $2,000 in addition to the $5,000? A. Yes, sir; to meet payments, five gentlemen paid. Jay Cooke & Co. never paid that.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. No member of your firm put in any after that? A. Never.

By Mr. NEW:

Q. There was $5,000 each originally put in by each of five different persons? A. Yes, sir.
Q. And $25,000 in addition by Jay Cooke & Co.?
A. Yes, sir; that is the whole sum and substance of it.

Q. What was the aggregate amount of the assessment? Å. Ten thousand dollars, so that $60,000 was all that was ever put in.

By Mr. New :

Q. You may state whether this money was used by you in purchasing real estate for the pool.
A. Yos, sir.
Q. Were purchases made by you as trustee for the members of the pool?
A. Yes, sir.

- Q. In purchases that were made for the pool, how were conveyances taken; to members of the pool or to some other person or persons in trust?

  A. They were generally taken to me as trustee.
  Q. You say generally. Was there any exception?
  A. There may have been when I was away.
  Q. I mean was there any exception?
  A. None except to some person as trustee or some other member of the firm.
  Q. Were the conveyances in such cases executed to you as trustee?

  A Year sir.

Q. Were the conveyances in such cases executed to you as trustee?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did such instrument of purchase or conveyance name the beneficiaries?
A. No, sir.
Q. Was there at the time of the execution of such instrument of trust any other or separate instrument showing for whom the purchases were in fact made?
The WITNESS. At the time the several purchases were made?
Mr. NEW. Yes.
A. No, sir.
Q. Was there at the time of the execution of those instruments of trust any other or separate instrument showing for whom the purchases were made in fact?
A. I think when we received the money we gave to the parties or beneficiaries a statement showing what proportion each had put in.
Q. There were, then, when money was paid separate instruments of the kind named executed?
A. There was a statement given by us, signed by me I think, given to the par-named executed?

A. There was a statement given by us, signed by me I think, given to the parties furnishing the money. That is my recollection of it.

Q. You say at the time the money was furnished?

A. I think that was at the time the money was paid in.

Q. But when a purchase was made and a conveyance taken to yourself as trustee, did you at that time, as trustee, or at any time, execute to the members of the pool, or any of them, any declaration of trust?

A. I understand it now. I stated when they advanced this money. I think it was after we made the purchase and invested the money; I think then we gave a statement showing what property we had purchased. That is my recollection of it now.

By the CHAIRMAN:

- Q. There was nothing indicating title for the benefit of these gentlemen? A. O, no; we have all the abstracts and everything to show in our office.

By Mr. NEW:

- By Mr. New:

  Q. Were there any other written declarations of trust executed by yourself or your firm or any member of the firm, as trustee, and delivered to the parties other than what you have named?

  A. No, sir; that is all.

  Q. Had you or your firm or any member of your firm any interest except as agents or real-estate brokers and trustees in said pool?

  A. Not at first.

  Q. Had you at any time?

  A. We purshased one interest—we have purchased all the interest.

  Q. You first purchased one interest?

  A. Yes, sir.

  Q. Was that a purchase by yourself or by the firm?

  A. A purchase by the firm.

  Q. By the firm consisting of Kilbourn & Latta, or Kilbourn, Latta & Olmstead?

  A. I do not remember whether Olmstead was then in the firm or not.

  Q. About when was that interest purchased?

  A. That was in 1873, I think. It was before the last investigation.

  Q. To refresh your recollection, you then stated that you thought it was about six months prior to that time?

  A. Yes, sir.

  Q. That investigation commenced March 5, 1874.

  A. The purchase was made in 1873 some time.

  Q. From whom did you purchase the interest you referred to—the first interest that your firm purchased?

  A. From the owner. I respectfully decline to answer who the parties were.

  Q. Did you purchase his entire interest?

  A. Yes, sir.

  Q. Was it a purchase from one member of the pool, or more than one?

  A. At that time I purchased the interest of one man who had put in $5,000.

  By the CHAIRMAN:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What amount was paid for that interest? A. Precisely what he gave, $5,000. And we paid the assessment of $2,000 our-dives; gave him exactly what he gave without interest.

By Mr. NEW:

Q. How many members of the pool were there before you became a member? I believe you have in fact answered.

A. Five gentlemen besides Jay Cooke & Co. put in $5,000 apiece.

Q. Will you state where each of these five members reside?

A. I do not know that I could do that. Mr. Chairman, if you will indulge me, I respectfully decline to give any testimony as it relates to these individuals.

Q. Do you decline to state where they reside?

A. I do not know that I could. I could upon reflection, probably.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Would you refuse to state, if you knew? We want to know whether that is no of the questions you decline to answer.

A. I decline to answer except upon consultation with my counsel.

By Mr. New:

Q. For the present you decline to state, even if you were certain as to the locality, where they do reside?

A. Yes, sir; I respectfully decline to state anything in relation to individuals who did business with us except upon consultation with my counsel.

Q. Will you please state their names?

A. That I beg to include in the same answer.

Q. State by what members of the pool you were supplied with money to be invested therein, other than Jay Cooke & Co.?

A. The money was supplied by five gentleman who comprised the other members of the pool aside from Jay Cooke & Co.?

A. Yes, sir. I will state this: If it can be shown in any way that the Government is interested or that it will promote the interests of the Government in any way to the extent of one dollar, I will tell everything about it. I will tell everything about it if the Government has been wronged in any shape or manner. The Chairman. That is what we expect to show, and we hope you will co-operate with us in doing it.

WITNESS. I am willing to do anything that will do that.

The Chairman. But we would not allow you to be the entire judge about that. WITNESS. Anything that you can show; but it seems to me it must be brought around in some other way than by going through our books.

Mr. New. We are calling you to aid us.

WITNESS. If the Government has been defrauded in any way through us we are ready to give you all information; but this being a purely private business matter of course we must decline to give publicity to that until it is shown that it has some connection with the Government.

Mr. New. Is the instrument executed to you or the firm as trustees recorded in our books or is there any official record of it in this District? WITNESS. The papers we gave to the parties that furnished the money? Mr. New. No. sir; the instrument executed to you, or your firm, or any member

Mr. New. No, sir; the instrument executed to you, or your firm, or any member thereof, as trustees.

Witness. Yes, sir; all were recorded in the recorder's office of the District of Columbia. They are all on record here in the District.

Q. Did such recorded instruments set forth all or any of the trusts upon which you or any of your partners, as such trustee or trustees, held the property described in such instrument?

A. The records will speak for themselves. We can furnish you with the deeds and deeds of trust.

Q. Do you recollect how that is?

A. My recollection is that all that was put on the record is the conveyance of title to us as trustees and the trust deed we gave back for deferred payments. The negotiations we had with the owners of the property.

Q. When did you first begin to keep a record in your office of such instruments, if you kept one?

A. That I cannot tell.

Q. Did you keep a record in your office of such instruments?

A. That I cannot tell.
Q. Did you keep a record in your office of such instruments?
A. The presumption is that we have a record of all our business transactions.
Q. So far as you do know, that is the fact, is it not?
A. Yes, sir. I do not think we have transacted any business except we have a record of it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Has that been known to the members of the pool?
WITNESS What is that?
The CHAIRMAN. The fact that you have kept a record.
A. I do not know that we have kept any record of that part of it. I presume we kept copies of the papers we gave them.
Q. The beneficiaries have knowledge that you are keeping an exact account of

Q. The beneficiaries have knowledge that you are keeping an exact account of your transactions, have they not?

A. I suppose so. I think, Mr. Chairman, you will find in that previous examination there the record of all the property purchased for this pool. If you desire it, we can give it to you. It is a matter of record. I think it is all stated there, but I am not resiritive.

I am not positive. *
Mr. New. We know that to be a fact.

By Mr. Lewis:

Q. Do you mean this exhibit attached to your subpana duces tecum?
A. Probably four fifths of that belongs to Sunderland & Hillyer; four fifths of that property.

By the CHAIRMAN:

By the Chairman:

Q. Was the other property embraced in that bought by you as trustee?

A. I say that my impression now is that four-fifths of the property you call for is property we bought for Sunderland & Hillyer, and I presume the other property is purchases we made for the pool.

Q. In addition to what you say is embraced in this list as having been purchased for the pool by you, are there any other lots or blocks of ground here that you have purchased, not in that?

A. I do not know. I have not looked over it carefully. After looking it through, I presume that all the property you have got in there is purchased by us as trustees; and four-fifths of that property is for Sunderland & Hillyer, and the other one-fifth is for this pool. I find upon examination of the list of property attached to the subpcena that while it includes all the real estate purchased for the pool—Stewart, Sunderland & Hillyer—it also includes property purchased for Kilbourn & Latta and the individual members of the firm, and also thirty-five pieces of real estate which we know nothing about, never having had anything to do with it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

& Latta and the individual members of the firm, and also thirty-five pieces of real estate which we know nothing about, never having had anything to do with it.

By the Chairman:

Now, Mr. Kilbourn, it is due to you to say that the committee have considered very maturely the question submitted by your attorney and the response made by Mr. Christy, and not only that, but the general subject in all its lights, and have come to the conclusion that they require you to respond to the requirements of that subpena duces tecum—that you shall produce the books and papers as therein set Forth; and we hope that you will at once see the necessity of it. We are engaged in a legitimate investigation, one in which every good citizen ought to give his assistance. We do not mean to do any harm or detriment to any interest, and hope you will at once respond in good faith to the requirements of that subpena. We are very anxious to facilitate this investigation and get rid of it. It has now been upon the hands of Congress for nearly three years, and we think the whole thing can be explained satisfactorily to Congress and the country in thirty days, perhaps even in less time, in ten days. I do not see why it cannot be in a single meeting, and we hope you will aid us to do so.

WITNESS. As I stated, I should have counsel to speak for me, but he is not here. I stated on oath the extent of this pool, and that it was such a trivial matter, and I thought that that would be satisfactory. At the same time I can make this further statement, that, if it can be satisfactorily shown in the remotest degree that the Government or the public interest is in any way concerned in this matter, we are willing to give the whole thing to the country. And I would like to have this put on record too, that I think fully four-fifths of that property belongs to Sunderland & Hillyer. Mr. Hillyer, the representative of said irm, was here the other day, and is now willing to come and tell all about that. If we should bring up the books and papers in reference Witness. I understand that it is not stated that we are shielding anything, but it is a general inquiry for looking through our books and papers, with the idea that possibly something might be found in which the Government is interested.

The CHAIRMAN. No, you are laboring under a misapprehension. I will make this brief statement to you, and then leave it to you either to comply with the subpœnaers that the consequences.

brief statement to you, and then leave it to you either to comply with the subpœns or take the consequences.

Mr. New. And also as to answering the questions that he has refused to answer. The Charram. We know, (whether you do or not.) as a matter of record, that Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., directly, and Jay Cooke & Co., indirectly, are indebted to the Government. We know, if you do not, that Jay Cooke & Co. have an interest in this real-estate pool. Can you not see that to this extent the Government? And now we are trying to ascertain what that interests.

WITNESS. Excuse me right there. We have settled with Jay Cooke & Co. The Charraman. We say that that settlement has not covered the interest.

WITNESS. That is the point I want to get at.

The CHARRAM. Your own, like a great many other settlements in the past, has been made to the detriment—whether intentionally so or not—of the parties concerned.

WITNESS. I understand. As I said, of course I have had counsel in the matter all Wirness. I understand. As I said, of course I have had counsel in the matter all WINESS. I understand. As I said, or course I have had counsed in the matter and the time, but he is not here now—

The CHAIRMAN. We have heard everything that counsel could say.
WITNESS Of course it is proper for me to consult with him. As I stated, anything that I can do to promote the interests of the Government in any way, shape, or manner, I will do cheerfully.

By Mr. LEWIS:

By Mr. Lewis:

Q. If your counsel advises you, after the announcement of the decision of the committee, to respond to this subpana duces tecum and also to answer the questions that have been propounded to you this morning, are you prepared to do it?

A. I think he would be a very poor client that would not stand by the advice of his counsel. That is what I employ one for. It is only the question of my legal rights that I wish protected.

Mr. New. Do you desire to consult with your counsel further as to whether you shall, or shall not, or will, or will not, reconsider your declication to produce the books and papers, &c., named in the subpana duces tecum, and your refusal to answer the questions that have been asked you during this investigation?

WITNESS. I think it is but proper that I should; I would certainly like that privilege.

WITNESS. I think to its out proposed to the group of the day can you inform us whether you will maintain your present attitude in that regard before the committee, or whether you will respond?

WITNESS. I have been trying all morning to find Judge Black.

Mr. New. You can see him during the day?

WITNESS. I think so.

Mr. New. Suppose you indicate some hour now.

Witness. I think so.

Mr. New. Suppose you indicate some hour now.

Witness. I can communicate with the chairman or any one of the committee at any time the committee indicate. I do not know where Judge Black is, and I can let you know at ten o'clock Monday morning.

Mr. New. We would like to know to-day.

The Chairman. We must press this matter forward, it has been delayed so much, and you owe it to the committee at least, if not to yourself, that your attorney should be here.

and you owe it to the committee at least, if not to yourself, that your attorney should be here.

Mr. New. Do you think you could appear here at the adjournment of the House this afternoon with your counsel?

WITNESS. If I can find him. I certainly will appear anyhow and let you know whether I can find him or not.

Mr. Lewis. Perhaps we had better say three o'clock.

WITNESS. If you will indicate any hour I will be here.

Mr. New. We will expect you here at three o'clock, and then a determination of this matter by you, whether counsel shall be with you or not.

The committee then took a recess until three o'clock.

The committee resumed its session at three p. m.

Mr. New stated that at the meeting of the committee this morning the witness, Hallet Kilbourn, had expressed a desire to confer further during the day with his counsel, and that in order to give him the opportunity to do so the committee had adjourned to this hour. The committee had now met, not for the purpose of hearing further argument in the premises, but of knowing what the witness had finally determined upon, as to whether he would or would not respond to the subpowae duces tecum, and whether he would or would not answer those questions which he has heretofore failed to answer.

Mr. Black, counsel for the witness, said that he wanted a record made up, which would justify one party or the other in doing what they respectively intended to do. He wished, therefore, to put some questions to the witness.

By Mr. BLACK:

Q. Please state to the committee, on your oath, whether there is anything in the nature or history of this real-estate pool connected with any public affair, or whether it is purely a private matter.

A. It is purely a private matter, and has no relation in the remotest degree to any public interest whatsoever.

Q. Was it, or not, a private partnership?

A. It was entirely so.

Q. Relating to private business?

A. Yes.

Yes. Was there any public money invested in it by anybody?

A. Yes.

Q. Was there any public money invested in it by anybody?

A. Not a dollar.

Q. Is it connected in any way with the public act of any officer of the District of Columbia or the United States Government?

A. Not in the remotest degree. Jay Cooke & Co. put in $25,000.

Q. Are they in it now?

A. No, sir; nobody is interested in it now but Kilbourn & Latta.

Q. Have you ever objected to a revelation of that business on any other ground than that it is a mere private transaction?

A. That is the only reason why I have ever objected to answering questions about it, that it is a purely private business.

Mr. Black. That is all that I want to ask the witness. But I want to go a little further and have this record put into shape so that it will bear the test of the scrutiny of any other tribunal before which it may hereafter be brought. To that end I call the attention of the committee to a fact which occurred before the committee at a former meeting, namely, a call upon the party who was promoting this investigation for any contradiction of the statement which the witness has just made, that this is purely a private afkir; and I now repeat (representing the witness, and as his counsel) his entire willingness to answer any interrogatories that the committee may put to him concerning the nature and history of the real-estate pool, so called, provided that any gentleman here, or any member of the committee, will express his conviction, grounded on any fact known to him, that there is any connection whatever with any public man that Congress has a right to investigate or to found any legislation upon. If that be so, then there is an end of all controversy; the witness "comes down" immediately and gives the committee any information that may be wanted on the subject. Otherwise it must be taken for granted that the nature and character of that transaction is what he described it to be on his cath, a purely private matter.

Mr. New. I desire to say, in answer to counsel and with reference to the questions which he has propounded to the witness, that in the opinion of the committee those questions, in their very nature, contemplate the statement of a conclusion and not the statement of facts on which a conclusion may be based; not the facts from which the committee could or would form a conclusion. Therefore the committee will not ask Mr. Kilbourn any questions by way of cross-examination. In the next place I desire to say in respect to what has been said about there being no party or about the necessity of some party making certain statements or declarations, to the effect that this is a public matter, and not a private matter, that on a former occasion the same proposition was suggested by yourself and the committee then answered, as the committee now answers, that we are acting on a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives. In other words, so far as we may know from the record, the party complaining or suggesting that there may be some discovery that will be of benefit to the Government as a creditor of Jay Cooke & Co., is the House of Representatives. We feel that we have no alternative, and no duty to perform, except to proceed with the investigation for the purpose of discovering what may be (if anything) discovered as to the history of the real-estate pool, and as to the indebtness of Jay Cooke & Co. to the Government. I desire, in conclusion, to have the witness state whether or not he desires still to abide by his action heretofore in refusing to respond to a subpena duces textm and in refusing to respond to questions which have been propounded to him. Mr. Black rose to make some remarks.

Mr. New. The committee cannot hear any further argument in the matter. There has been oral argument on both sides, and if the committee is to make any progress in this investigation these arguments must of course have a termination.

After conference with the other members of the committee, Mr. New said: For the purpose of giving Mr. Kilbourn and yourself a little further time to consider, we have c

MARCH 13, 1876-10 o'clock a. m.

Hallet Kilbourn, the witness, being present before the committee, the chairman said: By the agreement at the last meeting on Saturday evening, this morning was set apart to hear your final decision as to whether you would respond to the subpena duces tecum and would answer those questions which you were asked and to which you refused to respond last week.

The WITNESS. I have nothing further to say, except that I respectfully decline to answer, for the reasons heretofore stated.

The committee are of opinion and report that it is necessary, for the efficient prosecution of the inquiry ordered by the House, that said Hallet Kilbourn should be required to respond to the subpena duces tecum and answer the questions which has refused to answer; and that there is no sufficient reason why the witness should not obey said subpena duces tecum and answer the questions he has declined to answer; and that his refusal as aforesaid is in contempt of this House.

J. M. GLOVER, Chairman.
J. D. NEW.

B. B. LEWIS.

A. HERR SMITH.

Mr. PRATT is absent.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I presume the House is now fully in possession of facts enough to enable it to understand the attitude of this witness toward this House. I am instructed by the committee to ask the adoption of the following order, upon which I ask the previous question:

Ordered. That the Speaker issue his warrant directing the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House, or his deputy, commanding him to take into custody forthwith, wherever to be found, the body of Hallet Kilbourn, and him bring to the bar of the House to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt; and in the mean time keep the said Kilbourn in his custody to wait the further order of the House.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the order was adopted.

Mr. GLOVER moved to reconsider the vote by which the order was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise for the purpose of moving that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill. Pending that motion I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Boone.]

PAWNEE INDIANS.

Mr. BOONE. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report, in response to a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, a bill to authorize the sale of the Pawnee reservation.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 2678) was read a first and second time.

Mr. BOONE. I move that this bill be ordered to be printed, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and be made a special order for next Monday at one o'clock

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. RANDALL.) The Chair would suggest that that order may interfere with the call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. BOONE. I am not particular when this bill shall come up, provided it receives consideration early next week.

Mr. KELLEY. I object to the appropriation of Monday to any special order. Monday has its appropriate business, which I think should not be infringed upon by any special order. I have no objection to making the bill a special order for some other day.

Mr. BOONE. Well, say Friday.

The SPEAKER processors. Evidence appropriate business.

Mr. BOONE. Well, say Friday.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Friday is private-bill day.
Mr. BOONE. Then, let Thursday, the 23d, be fixed.
Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. After the morning hour.
Mr. BOONE. I modify my motion so as to fix Thursday, the 23d, after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the motion of the gentleman at modified; and it will be regarded as adopted.

DEFALCATION OF WILLIAM T. COLLINS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr.

Mr. Jenks, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to this House the amount of defalcation of William T. Collins, late pension gent at Washington City; who were his bondsmen and for what amount; what steps have been taken for the recovery of said defalcation; and where the said William T. Collins is now residing.

Mr. JENKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT JUDGE FOR COLORADO TERRITORY.

Mr. HUNTON. By the instruction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I ask unanimous consent to report back for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to this House at an early day copies of all letters, telegrams, and papers asking for the removal of Judge Belford, a district judge for the Territory of Colorado, and copies of all letters, telegrams, and papers asking for the appointment of Judge Stone to succeed Judge Belford; also copies of all papers, letters, and telegrams appertaining to the alleged arbitrary and corrupt rulings, orders, and decrees of Judge Stone in the interest of those who procured his appointment, which are now on file in the office of the Attorney-General; also the names of all persons who otherwise than in writing demanded the removal of Judge Belford and the appointment of Judge Stone.

Mr. KELLEY objected, and the resolution was not received.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now renew my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate.

A message from the Senate. by Mr. Sympson, one of its clerks, announced the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 83) for the relief of James A. Hile, of Lewis County, Missouri, without amendment.

It further announced the passage of a bill (S. No. 546) to further the administration of justice in the State of Colorado; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other pur-

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I have with some care examined the bill reported to the House by the Committee on Appropriations and now under consideration. And I am well convinced that many of its provisions, in relation to the governments in the Territories, should they become law, will work great hardship to the people of the Territories, seriously embarrass the administration of their governments; and greatly retard the growth of their people and the development of their resources.

I have several amendments prepared, which I propose to offer to the bill, as the proper sections are read by the Clerk, and at this time I desire only to submit some general remarks upon the bill as it applies to the Territories, in the hope that the House may reverse what I deem the hasty and unwise conclusions of the committee. Sweeping reductions have been reported in the appropriations for the Territories. These reductions were doubtless honestly made by the committee in the supposed interest of economy and retrenchment, and in so far as

Mr. Chairman, neither myself nor the people whom I have the honor to represent are unaware of the universal demand of the American people for retrenchment in the public expenditures of the Government, nor of the pressing necessity therefor. Everywhere, all ernment, nor of the pressing necessity therefor. Everywhere, all ever this country, in public and private life, in official and in social circles, in politics and in religion, are to be seen the ugly evidences and baneful influences of extravagance and its consequent demoralizations and corruptions. And he who attempts to fasten this stain upon the garments of any one class, or of any one party, simply insults the common intelligence, controverts the common history, and does violence to the common experience of the country. The evil has pervaded all elements of society and infected all political parties. We need not be at a loss to discover the prime cause of all this disorder and loss of public and private virtue, for it is but the natural order and loss of public and private virtue, for it is but the natural result of a great civil war and the demoralization which it created. Neither is it profitable to discuss the responsibilities of that war, for its causes, its operations, and its results have passed into history, and the brave men who met each other in the deadly strife, where

Once was felt the storm of war, When it had an earthquake's roar, And flashed upon the mountain height And smoked along the shore—now sit happily together under the "banner of beauty and glory," with each other vieing in the prayer-

Peace, thy olive wand extend, And bid wild war his ravage end.

It is well, then, in these times of peace to correct the abuses of war. He who sees no corruptions in public affairs is totally blind; for all who have eyes can say

My business in this state
Made me a looker-on here in Vienna,
Where I have seen corruption boil and bubble,
Till it o'errun the stew.

And he who sees corruption only in the ranks of his political opponents and in the lower walks of life is partially blind; for-

Corruption is a tree, whose branches are Of an immeasureable length; they spread Everywhere; and the de w that drops from thence Hath infected some chairs and stools of authority.

In ferreting out corruption the people of this country, without distinction of party, bid you Godspeed. Let justice be meted out in its fullest measure, for "he who will not be ruled by the rudder must be ruled by the rock."

But the bill now under consideration aspires to apply the corrective in the direction of retrenchment. And to this the whole country gives its profound and grateful sanction. Too long have the people waited, watched, and prayed for this reform, while they have been answered with "a maximum of words and a minimum of deeds."

But, Mr. Chairman, I submit that the cheapest is not always the best, and every reduction of expense is not always economy. It is neither economy nor good husbandry to indiscriminately cut and prune the barren and the fruitful alike. Neither is it a good system of pruning which adopts an inflexible rule to cut all vines alike by a fixed percentage of measurement.

Mr. Chairman, I think I can show that the committee in their zeal for retrenchment have not used a proper discrimination, and that the per-cent. rule which they adopted worked great injustice and utterly fails to accomplish reform, but inflicts only evil where good was intended.

In order that we may understand ourselves and our relations to each other in these matters, I desire to look for a moment and inquire what are these Territories? Who are they who live out there, and are asking rights before an American Congress?

I will take the Territory of Idaho as an average example. This Ter-I will take the Territory of Idaho as an average example. This Territory was organized by an act of Congress, and is in every sense the creature of the General Government. In area, the Territory is three times as large as the State of Indiana. In beautiful scenery, of snow-capped mountains and lovely valleys, of grand cascades and calm lakes, it far surpasses the famed land of the Swiss, for I have seen them both. In beauty and salubrity of climate it is the peer of Italy for I have conjugate them both. Italy, for I have enjoyed them both. Its great mountains are permeated everywhere with quartz lodes and ledges of gold and silver, while amid the sands of its streams and its bars the freed golden dust meated everywhere with quartz lodes and ledges of gold and silver, while amid the sands of its streams and its bars the freed golden dust glitters in the sun, forming a fabulous array of marvelous deposits which will require the industry of ages to develop and exhaust, while pasturage, timber, fish, and game are in inexhaustible supply. Talk of your Hawaiian Islands, and your treaties of reciprocity with them, here in Idaho we offer a reciprocity backed by resources contrasting with those of the Hawaiian Islands as this great Republic of ours contrasts with the land and hereditaments of His Majesty King Kalakua. The people who live out there are your sons and brothers. They were not of that class whose ambition ascended no higher than to sit down quietly within sight of the chimney-smoke of the old home in New England or in the valley of the Mississippi, and content themselves with the little patrimony of their fathers, and satisfy their souls with eating at the same table, sleeping in the same bed, and voting the same ticket all their lives. No, they were made of sterner stuff. They possess that ambition which "is a spirit in the world that causes all the ebbs and flows of nations." They joined that grand army of pioneers who turned their faces toward the Pacific, trailing the broad plains, blazing the grand forests, and bridging the great rivers, that the course of empire might be charmed on its way westward. They belong to that mighty host of pilgrims who, with brave hearts and strong arms, have built empires in the valley of the Mississippi, scattered gardens over the plains, crossed the snow-capped mountains, everywhere met and conquered hardships and dangers, and are today upheaving the empires in the valley of the Mississippi, scattered gardens over the plains, crossed the snow-capped mountains, everywhere met and conquered hardships and dangers, and are to-day upheaving the river-beds and digging down the hills to supply the world with the precious metals "that fill the coffers of kings, replenish the exchequers of nations, and assist a return to specie payment in the only way possible." Now, then, let me ask you what you have done and what the Committee on Appropriations propose to do for such a country and such a people?

We have a government out there given to us by Congress and with

We have a government out there given to us by Congress, and with the recollection fresh in our minds that the prime cause of our revolutionary war was that we were taxed without representation and that swarms of officers were sent hither to rule us, we are to-day taxing the people of the Territories without granting them the representation for which we went to war with Great Britain. The people in the Territories are interested in the election of a President in every way that it is possible for the people of the States to be, and in many additional ways. You elect your governors and your judges; ours are appointed for us by the President, we having neither a choice of President nor his appointees. The appointments are generally made in the interest not of the people over whom they are to rule, but in the interest of party, and at the suggestion often of Senators who know but little of our needs and care less. And this rule is not peculiar to any one party, for it has always been so.

But you ask how can these things be avoided? I answer that the Constitution should be amended so as to do away entirely with the cumbrous and unfair machinery of an electoral college, and each qualified voter of the Republic should be allowed to vote directly for President, whether he is a citizen of the United States residing in a State or a citizen of the United States residing in a Territory.

State or a citizen of the United States residing in a State or a citizen of the United States residing in a Territory.

Again, the people of the Territories should be allowed to elect their own officers, as do the people of the States. In this way the people there would get their choice of rulers and a great source of political patronage be removed. A bill is now pending before the Committee on Territories for this purpose, and I understand will be reported adversely to the House, for what reason I am unable to perceive, unless it comes from that inordinate desire of all the sons of Adam to have somebody to rule over. Since the war has enfranchised the negro and given him the right of choosing his own rulers and of representation in Congress, there is nobody left disfranchised but your brothers in the Territories.

Then, again, the people of the Territorics have no representation in either House of Congress. It is true they are allowed the privilege of sending a Delegate to this House, who if he conducts himself modestly and does not meddle too much in public business is allowed a chair to sit down in when he is tired, and listen to the wit and the wisdom of the men who represent his old home in the States and who have never obeyed the injunction of "Go West and grow up with the country," and be disfranchised. It is true he is allowed to debate; but after he has had his say, after he has exercised his great constitutional right of "jaw-bone," and sits down feeling that he has made the subject luminous with his eloquence and his logic, the roll is called, and the Representatives of the people in the States, including the colored brethren, vote, it may be, unanimously against his proposition, and he is not even allowed to vote for it, that he may go back to his constituents and parade his record in self-defense. And worse than that, the Delegates are excluded from the committees of the House; even those committees whose business directly concerns the people of the Territories, as for instance those of Mines and Mining, Indian Affairs, Military Affairs, Public Lands, Private Land Claims, Pacific Railroads, Commerce, and Post-Offices and Post-Roads. On all these committees a Delegate from his experience could be of invaluable service to the committee, to his constituents, and to the country, and having no vote, could not possibly do harm if he desired. Yet during the first week of this session a resolution was introduced into the House for this purpose, and was referred to the Committee on Rules, and has never, I believe, been heard from. And this Committee on Rules is composed of good sort of men, all of whom are prospective, and one of whom a present candidate for the Presidency, and doubtless expecting the Delegates from all the Territories to vote for him in the national convention. You ask what is the remedy in this case

The people of the Territories are as intelligent, patriotic, and honest as yourselves. They are equally interested with you in all matters that come before this body. Questions of finance, of tariff, of customs, of revenue, of resumption, of inflation, and contraction, equally affect them, while in many matters their interests are even more immediate and pressing than yours. The great questions of the mines, the public lands, the Indians, the military, post-roads, and internal improvements are of vital interest to them, and often affect you but remotely. Suppose a Territory may not have a population as great as is required for a congressional district in a State, what then? I may be asked. I answer, first, that the people in a congressional district in a State are also represented in the Senate, and in a State Legislature that is supreme within its local jurisdiction, and its enactments are executed by an executive of their own choice; while the people of the Territories ask no Senators, and their local affairs are regulated by Congress, and executed by officers not of their selection.

In the second place I answer that it is not always numbers that entitle communities to representation. The framers of the Constitution recognized a different rule, for they allowed equal representation in the Senate and that each State should have at least one Representative without regard to population. As each Territory has all the machinery of a State government, all the local interest, and all the general interests of a whole State, to say nothing of a mere congressional district, I am unable to see the wisdom or the justice in a denial to them of full representation in the House. Originally these necessities were not so pressing and a disfranchisement did not work so harshly, for then a territorial government was but temporary and soon gave way to State government; but now when the population required for a State has been so extended these territorial governments become more than temporary, and are humiliating, oppressive, and directly in contravention of the principles of a free self-government. And the outlook is rather gloomy, for when, as in the case of New Mexico, after a disfranchisement and vassalage of nearly a quarter of a century she comes here, fulfilling all the requirements of law, she is met in the Senate by the mighty empire of Delaware, and her admission is higgled over and allowed to get in, if at all, by a close vote. When the people of a Territory ask a donation of public lands for the construction of a railroad they are met by those who already have their roads with the cry that the public lands should be kept for the "actual settler." They seem to think that if granted for railroad purposes the lands will be carried off to some other planet out of the reach of this historical "actual settler." The average Congressman seems unable to discover that without a railroad these millions of acres are worthless to the "actual settler," while with a road the actual settler can get plenty of Government land, and the railroad land, too, if he desires it. Until the road is built the "actual settler" is a myth. The building of the road makes the farms and brings the actual settler along with it and renders the Government land valuable which before was not worth a farthing.

land valuable which before was not worth a farthing. But, to return to my subject. What does the Committee on Appropriations in the bill now before us propose to do for the development and settlement of the Territories? What have they done to encourage the vital industries and to promote the growth of the Territories? What have they devised to hasten the end of this anomalous system of territorial governments begotten of an adulterous connection between patriotism and tyranny? What impetus do they give to the adding of new States to the Union and new stars to the flag? Let us see. A few years ago the United States Government erected at Boise City, in the Territory of Idaho, a magnificent assay building, and supplied it with a full complement of machinery necessary to its successful operation. The building was constructed of stone, under the direction of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, at a cost of over $50,000, since which time it has been in working order. The last Congress appropriated $7,500 for its expenses. That appropriation will expire on the 30th day of June next. The Committee on Appropriations have refused to make any appropriation for its continuance. I shall at the proper time offer an amendment restoring the appropriation with a reasonable reduction. If my amendment is not adopted, the assay office will be abolished, a severe blow given to the interests of the laboring-people of that Territory and to the principal industry of that country. I suppose the reason of the course of the committee is found in the fact that during the last year the amount of assaying done at the office did not pay enough to meet the expense to the Government. While I shall at the proper time explain this, I now say generally, that if it is in the interest of economy to abolish entirely all institutions of the Government which do not pay expenses, then indeed is the field for retrenchment inviting, for in that case you can abolish the postal system in all the Territories and in the sparsely settled States; for it

But, Mr. Chairman, I submit whether such a rule can be adopted. The question of economy cannot be solved by a calculation of the actual cash saved to the Government. If I can show that the assay office at Boise City is of great service to the mining interest, and that its discontinuance would work injury to that great branch of industry, I shall appeal to this House to reverse the opinion of the committee and by its action subserve that higher economy which does not always look at paltry dollars and cents as its true measure, and I shall hope that my appeal will not be in vain.

If the House can conceive the earnest protest of the people in the mining districts against the abolition of the office as being worth anything or entitled to any consideration, the office will certainly be continued and made even more efficient than at present. If the continuance did not affect seriously the most vital interest of the people of Idaho, and more particularly the thousands of our citizens who are engaged in the mining districts, the act of abolishing the office and saving $7,500 per annum to the Government might be tolerated on the paltry ground of economy; but when viewed in a larger sense, and considered in the light of its great utility to the people of the Territory as well as to the commercial interest of the country at large, it will not, I apprehend, be deemed wise or economical to suspend or abolish its operation at this time. The important branch of industry, its development and success, in aid of which the Government constructed the assay office at a cost of $50,000, stands as much in need of the aid and congressional encouragement now as did the necessity for the creation and construction of the office in the first instance.

By the act of continuing the assay office on its present plan, and under its present judicious management, nine thousand people out of a population of about fifteen thousand are directly interested and affected thereby, because that is the proportion of the population at present engaged in the business of mining, and producing gold and silver in our mineral districts. The wise and liberal legislation of Congress which called the office into existence was based on the absolute necessity of protection to and encouragement of the arm of industry confined to the production of the precious metals. The cause for continuing in operation the office is both great and urgent. By means of the privileges and advantages afforded by the office the miner who invests his capital and labor is enabled to determine and secure the just value of his toil, and the whole business community protected against exacting monopoly in the undervaluation of the bullion taken from the miner. Suspend the business of this office, and you turn loose upon the honest toiling classes, who brave the hardships incident to a mining life and occupation, a horde of bullion brokers and private assayers who are placed in a position by organized combinations and fraud to oppress by tax and unreasonable charges

By the establishment of the office and the appointment of an assayer and melter and refiner by the Government of the United States as now, honest dealing is guaranteed to the miner who produces the gold and silver and the merchant who makes advances upon the credit of the bullion as stamped by the sworn officers of the United States, a credit which cannot be elicited or secured on bullion stamped by private operators in the business of assaying. No commercial house New York, San Francisco, Chicago, Philadelphia, Saint Louis, or New Orleans will credit the private stamp as designating the value of the bullion or bar of gold or silver, and the consequence and inevitable result is that the miner or merchant must submit and pay the tax of another when the bar is finally disposed of.

Take the history of every new mining district on the Pacific coast in process of development, and you have before you these certain facts: from ten to twenty thousand assays will be necessitated in the process of opening up a mineral district; and it makes no difference whether the ore justifies or not, the price of the assay averages from five to seven dollars and a half for each assay, which when made gives no guarantee of its accuracy. At the present time the miners and producers are protected from those extortions by the presence of the Government office, where tests are honestly made and reliable returns rendered, and at less than one-fifth the cost of private charges, so that by the advantages and facilities given to the people in Idaho, by the maintenance of the office under the auspices of the Government, developments are more general, labor and capital more steadily directed, and encouraged by the correct medium through which results are given and determined in the progress of opening up mines.

It is not only the men who go into the mining districts and perform the physical labor and risk their personal means, but the capitalists in New York and other large cities in the East, West, North, and South, who participate in the enterprise of mining and place their means and capital in that channel of industry, who derive the benefits from the establishment of an assay office by the Government. The whole business and operation of the office and the reports of its officers as to the nature, extent, and peculiar character of the mines and mineral resources, as examined by them, and certified to them by and through the most reliable medium, and from the highest and most authenticated sources, go to the country at large, and are considered of an invaluable character. Will the Government deprive the laboring and commercial classes, as well as the very useful class of people of the country known as capitalists, of the great benefits secured by the continuance, or will it cut off those privileges and advantages, suspend the operations of the office, and save under the pretense of reform $7,500 per annum?

The isolated condition of our Territory, our mineral districts being hundreds of miles from communication by rail or water transportation, leaves us a little world in ourselves engaged in the business of producing gold and silver. Carson City, five hundred miles; Portland, nearly six hundred; San Francisco, more than seven hundred miles away; abolish the office and you force the people of Idaho to ship their gold dust and gold and silver bullion to some one of those points and wait for returns before they can put the proper or correct

Again, Mr. Chairman, the salaries of our territorial officers are so reduced in this bill that every branch of our civil service will be crippled and obstructed. For instance, take as an example the salaries of our judges. The judicial system in the Territories consists of one chief and two associate justices. These judges hold the district courts in all the counties and a supreme court once a year at the capital. They have both territorial and Federal jurisdiction. should be men thoroughly learned in the law and fully competent to perform their varied and responsible duties. They perform the duties of State circuit judges, State supreme judges, and of the United States circuit and district judges. In the Territory of Idaho, to reach all the courts, our judges are compelled to travel each year thousands of miles, and wholly on horseback and by stage-coach. They work nearly the whole time. On account of the distance from railroad, for everything which they have to buy they pay nearly double as much as is paid in the States. They receive their pay in currency; and, as gold is the standard of value there, every dollar is discounted 15 per cent. The salary of a judge is now $3,000, and so inadequate is this sum that a few years ago the territorial Legislature passed an act increasing the pay, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Idaho, The salaries of the following officers of Idaho Territory are hereby increased, in addition to the compensation already provided by the United States Government, as follows: governor, chief justice, associate justices, each, the sum of $2,500 per annum; to the secretary of the Territory, $1,000 per annum.

And Congress, exercising its controlling authority over the territorial Legislature, annulled the act and passed a future prohibition, as follows:

In an act of Congress approved July 15, 1870, the following provision is found:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed by the Legislative Assembly of Idaho Territory that provide for the payment of salaries or extra compensation out of the territorial treasury to officers holding commissions by Federal appointment in said Territory are hereby disapproved of and annulled; and the Legislative Assembly is hereby prohibited from making any appropriations from the treasury of said Territory to any such officers, or persons, under any pretense of adding to or increasing their compensation as fixed by the United States.

Thus it will be seen that Congress will neither pay our officers reasonable salaries nor allow us to do so ourselves.

I intended to ask this Congress for an increase of salary for the judges, for we have competent men, citizens of the Territory, and the people desire to retain them. Yet this bill reduces their salaries to $2,800, which after the discount is $2,125. And this is done while the same bill for less labor and no more responsibility gives the judges in the District of Columbia $4,000. The result will be that no respectable lawyer will hold the places in the Territories, and the people there, the interests of the Territory and the United States alike, will be turned over to the tender mercies of "shysters," sent there from the purlieus of police courts in search of bribes.

I earnestly protest against such an unjust and dangerous proceeding. I could say the same in relation to other officers whose salaries are reduced, and will do so when I have an opportunity to offer amendments. Until then I drop this subject.

One other thing, and I am done. There are many ways to retrench in the Territories without doing this violence to all our interests. I mention only one—in the Indian service, that greatest of all swindles in this country. In the Indian service in Idaho alone a sum amounting to more than the whole expense of the territorial government might be saved. Every year about $40,000 is appropriated for contingent expenses, and for giving presents to Indians, and for putting Indians on reservations in Idaho. At the proper time I want to show the House how that thing works. I have been for four years among these Indians, and I never knew one of them during that time put on a reservation, and I know that no man has attempted it: yet this fund has been regularly drawn by somebody. I know a small tribe of Indians whose agents each year drew $20,000 which was appropriated, and from the evidence, taken in writing in my presence, of the Indians, I ascertained that not $5,000 in eight years had been used for the Indians. But of this when the Indian bill comes up.

If you want to economize in the Territories, put a stop to the system based upon hypocrisy and theft, turn the Indians over to the War Department, and, instead of treating them as the pets of the na-tion, deal with them fairly, prevent them from being robbed by psalm-singing and non-psalm-singing thieves, allow them, not hundreds of square miles, as now, but land sufficient for their needs, and then let them do as poor white men do, work or starve. In the language of another, I say:

In the language of another, I say:

The Indians cannot longer shirk the duties and responsibilities of human beings. They must decide what to do, and abide by their choice. The idea that the Government is going to carry the Indians like so many big bronze babies in its arms, and feed and clothe them and humor all their whims, and keep them well supplied with all sorts of toys, from glass beads to Sharpe's rifles, is too ridiculous to be tolerated. The truth is, the sentimental view of the Indians has played itself out. They have developed no capacities for civilization, no aptitudes for industry, no ambition for progress—nothing but laziness and an enormous ability to be supported by the Government, and an overmastering appetite for all the vices of frontier life. The time has come to look the facts squarely in the face. The laws which govern populations are terribly stern and inexorable in their operations. The fittest survive. The earth is for those who have the industry, the skill, the pluck and hardihool to possess it. All attempts to preserve a race of idlers and loungers and thieves, strutting about with feathers in their hair and moccasins on their feet, insisting that land enough shall be secured to each one of them to support forty whites, and that they shall be protected from imposition while committing all sorts of depredations, are too preposterous to be seriously entertained for a moment. The philanthropy is all on one side. There is no humanity in trying to perpetuate arace that will not civilize itself and cannot be civilized. It stands in the way of human progress. It eats the substance that belongs to nobler peoples. It is a drain on the productive capacities of the earth, and a burden that no government is bound to carry. The sooner the Indians are made to feel this fact, and compelled to choose whether they will go to work like other men or starve, the better for themselves and everybody.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not urge appropriations at this session out-

Mr. Chairman, I shall not urge appropriations at this session outside our regular sums for the territorial government. I shall yield to the great demands of the people for retrenchment. We in Idaho I shall yield We in Idaho are poor and needy. We have no capitol buildings, no United States court-house, our navigable rivers are obstructed, and we have no railroad or telegraph built by Government subsidy, yet all I shall ask is to be let alone, and not robbed of our just and necessary appropriations because others have been extravagant. And to this end I beg, in the name of common justice, common honesty, common sense, common decency, and common brotherhood, that you let us keep what little we have, and, if you want to retrench, do it where it can be safely done, but be sure you do not mistake injustice for economy and cripple where you ought to sustain. The best economy is that which fosters industry, develops the resources of a country, and does justice to all.

If you will not let us vote for our rulers; if you will not give us representation along with our taxation; if you will not let us be on your committees; if you will not allow us to pay our own officers increased compensation; if you will squander money on worthless Indians; if you will refuse us public lands within our own borders to build us a railroad; and if you will disfranchise us, in the name of American honor I insist that you shall not kill us in the name of economy.

Mr. BLOUNT obtained the floor.

I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment. I yield, as I understand the gentleman will take Mr. KELLEY. Mr. BLOUNT. only a moment.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to ask the committee to rise for a few moments in order that I may bring to the attention of the House a paper just put into my possession charging me with most infamous crimes. [Laughter.] In view of the condition of my health I may be constrained to leave the House and therefore ask this indulgence. My statement will not take five minutes and the committee can then resume its session.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. RANDALL having taken The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. RANDALL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Cox reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the special order, a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire the Clerk to read an article in the paper I send to the desk, the New York World of to-day, headed "Another investigation."

WASHINGTON, March 13.

Washington, March 13.

One of Pennsylvania's noble Congressmen is next on the list to be investigated. A gentleman by the name of Martin Powers has written a letter to a member from Pennsylvania, referring to the relations which exist between the proprietor of a woolen mill on the Schuylkill, James Dobson, and W. D. Kelley. The letter is now in the possession of Mr. Mutchler, chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, who will investigate the allegations. The letter states that for the past sixteen years Mr. Kelley has used his influence as a member of Congress to obtain contracts for Mr. Dobson from the Indian Bureau, to furnish blankets; that Dobson, who twenty years ago was a porter, is now worth $10,000,000; and that Mr. Kelley has taken unto himself 20 per cent. of the profits of all contracts he has been influential in obtaining for Dobson, thereby netting in the neighborhood of $1,000,000. Mr. Powers, in his letter, says that every time Mr. Kelley comes up to the Falls of Schuylkill from Washington or Philadelphia it is for the purpose of receiving a check from Dobson, and he states that there are witnesses who will prove, as well as bank documents, checks, stubs, &c., the truth of his assertions. He asks that Dobson be put upon the stand. The allegations of this letter, it is but fair to state, are not credited by those who know Judge Kelley or by those who are familiar with the awards for many years of the contracts for Indian blankets.

Mr. KELLEY, Mr. Speaker, I apprehend it is due more to the Members.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I apprehend it is due more to the Messrs Dobson than myself that I should notice the statement just made. If there be a man in this House, or a person who knows me well, who attaches any importance to it, I have lived in vain.

Messrs. J. & J. Dobson (for Mr. James Dobson is but a junior partner in the house) are men to whom I have invited the attention of ner in the house) are men to whom I have invited the attention of hundreds of visitors to Philadelphia from other States and other countries. The senior brother never was a porter, but came to this country a young man skilled in the manufacture of woolen goods, which skill, with his integrity and honorable aspirations, constituted his capital. He toiled diligently, having his young brothers and sisters about and dependent upon him. He has built up the most magnificent carpet-works in the State of Pennsylvania, and they do but supplement the other branches of his woolen business. As his brothers have come of age they have been associated with him as partners ers have come of age they have been associated with him as partners in his business. They have never asked me, and I have been their Representative now nearly fifteen years, to raise my voice in any department of the Government in favor of any character of contract for them. It is their pride that they do business on business principles, and when many years ago Hon. William A. Burleigh, the then Delegate, I think, from Dakota, was declaiming upon the frauds perpetrated upon the Indians in the matter of blankets and protesting that the blankets for them were bought abroad when better could be made at home, I publicly interrogated him as to what part of England contained the village of the Falls of the Schuylkill, in the twenty-first ward of the City of Philadelphia and the fourth congressional district of Pennsylvania; and he who will turn to the record will find that four times I put that question to him, each time record will find that four times I put that question to him, each time assuring him that the Messrs. Dobson in my district had been able to beat the world in both quality and cheapness of Mackinaw blankets, the kind to which he was referring. So they had, and they have maintained that supremacy by the superiority and cheapness of their work. Meeting those gentlemen one evening in social life the senior Mr. John Dobson made the statement publicly in my hearing that that debate on Saturday, and in the debating society as it was, had been more than $100,000 in their pockets, for it had brought to them the trade of every Indian trader in the country and had enabled or the trade of every Indian trader in the country and had enabled, or the trade of every Indian trader in the country and had enabled, or rather required, them to build an additional factory in order to supply the new demand for their commodity.

That they are my friends I admit; that I honor them for their energy, their character, their great success, I freely admit. But, on the other hand, when I turned to the directory to find the name of the man who signs the letter Martin Powers—for my friend and colleague [Mr. MUTCHLER] has kindly put it at my disposal since this article was brought to my attention—I do not find it among those of the residents of the village from which his letter is dated. I do, however, discover this from that letter: that, while it came privately to my colleague [Mr. MUTCHLER] through his mail and has not been communicated by him to a human being, the infamous scoundrel who thus assails the character of my honorable constituents has taken pains to give it to the public through the press, knowing that the investigation he invited would brand him, and not the man he slanders, with infamy.

With these remarks, I thank the reporter of the World for having said what he did as to the opinion of those who know me. I thank the House also for its kindness in rising to give me this opportunity to say what I have said.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS-HALLET KILBOURN.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, the Sergeant-at-Arms is now at the bar of the House with the witness, Hallet Kilbourn.

The Sergeant-AT-Arms appeared at the bar with the witness and said: Mr. Speaker, in obedience to the order of the House, I now have in custody at its bar Hallet Kilbouru.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Kilbourn, you are presented at the bar of the House, upon the order of the House, under arrest on an alleged breach of the privileges of the House in refusing to answer certain questions propounded to you by a committee of the House, which questions that committee was authorized by the House to ask. It is my duty now, by authority of the House, to ask you whether you are now ready to answer those questions before the committee?

Mr. Kilbourn (the witness) said: As this arrest and these proceedings are a very important matter to me, a humble American citizen, I respectfully request this honorable body to allow me to be represented by my counsel, Judge Black, of Pennsylvania, and David Dud-the SPEAKER. The House has heard the request of the witness, who states that in his judgment this matter is to him one of very great importance, and that therefore he desires, before further answering, to be heard before the House by counsel. What is the pleasure of the House?

I believe, sir, that the request of the witness to be heard Mr. NEW. by counsel before the House orally is without precedent in the proceedings of this House. Of course, however, it is for the House to determine how it will permit the witness to be heard.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the witness be heard through his counsel.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the witness be heard through his counsel.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. Page] that the request of the witness be granted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the motion of the gentleman from California involves an important matter of practice upon the part of the House, and certainly should be considered for a moment. I believe that while perhaps such a request has been made of the House of Representatives, this course has not heretofore been adopted in any instance, although for many years there has been scarcely a session of the House when some citizen has not been before it for disobeying its process and refusing to respond to proper interrogations. The usual practice has been where the witness desired to make a statement of the grounds upon which he thought he was excused from answering a question or perhaps producing a record or other paper which was required to be produced, to read or have read in the presence of the House such reasons as he might think proper to present why he should not respond to the demands made by the House through its proper committee.

A citizen placed in the attitude of a witness declining to answer a question in the presence of this House can scarcely assume the attitude that it is necessary for the protection of his rights that he shall be heard by counsel. It may be presumed that all gentlemen on the floor are prepared to assert with equal impartiality the rights of the citizen as well as the dignity of the House of Representatives and to secure to the country the benefit of the exercise of its proper powers. It would not seem that by any possibility wrong or injustice can be done by the House acting upon the facts as presented. The august character of the body and impartial attitude of the members composing this tribunal repel the idea of the possibility of hasty action or of injustice to a citizen or an improper imperiling of his rights.

It seems to me, sir, that a departure from the practice which has prevailed in our history, a practice uniformly adhered to during all these years, would be attended with many embarrassments. A case might be presented where the questions raised were of so complicated a character that the House might desire to deliberate, and in such cases it would undoubtedly stop to deliberate. But where, as in this case, a witness is required to produce a record or to answer a question and the reason for not producing the record or answering the question is so clearly presented as is done in this instance, where the committee, the organ of the House of Representatives, has furnished such facilities for presenting the exact point, it would scarcely seem that by this House sitting in a judicial capacity, protecting on the one hand the rights of the citizen and on the other its own dignity, injustice can be done or a conclusion reached which would be other than that which might be reached by such a tribunal upon the fullest argument of

I can only suggest, Mr. Speaker, that nothing is presented in this case in the paper which has been read at the Clerk's desk which would seem to justify a departure from this uniform practice. It is impossible that there should not be debate. I will not be told that this case is analogous to that of a witness brought to the bar of a court for being in contempt of its authority. There, sir, from the very necessity of the case, the judge cannot enter upon an argument; he can hear no suggestions unless they come from counsel. The court must hear and deliberate, not argue. Here, this tribunal, exercising high judicial powers, is a body at once deliberative and judicial in its character. It may consider, it may argue, and yet may impartially decide. If this gentleman desires to be heard through counsel, it is due, it seems to me, to the character of this body that counsel should be heard through a written presentation of the facts, which may be read to this body. The controversies incident to the ordinary tribunal of justice would be scarcely suited to our deliberations. Counsel for and against would scarcely suit the character of this body as a tribu-and acting upon a judicial question.

I think, sir, it would not be wise to adopt this motion. If this citizen desires time to be heard and to prepare his reasons for not answering the questions propounded or producing records other than those already presented to the House by the report of the committee, undoubtedly the House would give him proper time. But upon a question like this, which is not a new question, but one which certainly is in accord with the experience of every old member of this House, has occurred every session, to enter into a minute and learned discussion of questions such as spring up in courts of justice would scarcely comport with the character of this body or its mode of deliberation. I hope that no precedent such as this will be set. It is opening up a new field for the consumption of time, which is somewhat valuable and ordinarily valuable to the public service.

If it could be suggested that the rights or liberties of the citizen were imperiled by a failure to grant such hearing, we should all readily concede that it should be done; but no right is involved, no peril to the citizen is involved in this case. He relieves himself at once by to the citizen is involved in this case. He relieves himself at once by answering the questions propounded to him and by the production of the record.

Why, sir, is it possible when the record which we have heard read shows that a single question was propounded, or a series of questions of the same general character, one of them involving whether or not the witness would produce a given record, that the House of Representatives will suspend the ordinary transaction of public business to hear arguments of counsel upon a question which arises daily in the transaction of public business in every department of life and constantly here?

Such discussions, sir, would not enlighten the tribunal, it seems to me, that is to pass upon the subject. This is not a question that arises casually or once in a long period, but it is a question of constant recurrence which citizens in their public relations are obliged to meet, not only in courts of justice or elsewhere in public employment. Sir, I cannot think that it is desirable that a new precedent should be established. If the citizen now at the bar of the House requires be established. If the citizen now at the bar of the House requires further time to prepare an answer to be read by himself, or at his instance, it is highly proper that his request should be granted without a moment's hesitation, judging by the former action of the House; but if counsel are to be heard, it is easy to imagine cases where counsel would have the right to be heard, for the whole people in answer to an argument presented in behalf of a single citizen. It is safer that a tribunal such as this should not only exercise its whole power, whether touching matters of public concern or of common occurrence as well as to deliberate and importally decide proposed. as well as to deliberate and impartially decide upon such a question, rather than a new element should be introduced into this body.

I have only thought it necessary to submit these remarks on the spur of the occasion from the reluctance I feel to enter on new fields in the House and to establish new precedents which in many contingencies might very greatly embarrass a proper exercise of the powers of this body.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, this resolution presents squarely a very grave question of constitutional liberty. The quiet attention which the House has paid to the suggestions of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] shows that the House sees that a very important and grave question is before us. The question to be determined so far as this witness is concerned is this, whether he shall or shall not, if he persists in the attitude which he has taken before the committee, be punished by this House for a contempt. The House is authorized to detain him in its custody to the end of its session as a matter of coercion. It is authorized also to sentence him to imprisonment of reasonable duration as a matter of punishment if it shall be of the opinion that in the refusal to answer the questions lawfully propounded by its authorized committee he is in contempt.

Now, the witness presents as his reason for this refusal a claim that he is within a protection secured by an express article of the amendments to the Constitution, to wit:

The right of the people to be secured in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated.

Now, without expressing and, if there is to be any further hearing in this matter, endeavoring not even to form an opinion whether that right is properly asserted, everybody will agree that a right contained in the articles of amendment to the Constitution, ingrafted on it shortly after the time of its inception and almost contemporaneous with its adoption, is the most important right of a citizen.

Now is it or is it not true that an investigating committee of this House has a right to say to this man, "Let us search your papers for our information?" That is a pretty grave and serious constitutional question, and it is a question involving pretty grave and serious rights of a citizen. And shall that question be adjudged without hearing the citizen in the ordinary constitutional form in which the rights of all citizens are defended?
A further amendment to the Constitution says that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the assistance of counsel for his defense." Now I do not claim that the process under which this witness may be punished for a contempt of this House is a criminal prosecution in the ordinary sense.

Mr. LAPHAM. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. HOAR. I think I can state the matter a little better if am allowed to state it consecutively, if the gentleman will pardon me.

Mr. LAPHAM. There is a provision in the statute.

Mr. HOAR. The Constitution is enough for my purpose.

Mr. LAPHAM. The gentleman was saying that it was not a criminal prosecution; I desire to correct him.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] vield?

HOAR] yield?

Mr. HOAR. I do not yield for that purpose. If this witness should be hereafter indicted, as the statute authorizes, before the courts of this District, he would be there indicted for the crime of refusing to testify. But I concede and I believe that the punishment of this witness for a contempt of the House is not technically a criminal proceeding. But it is a criminal proceeding within all the constitutional reasons and the justice which led to the adoption of this provision of the amendments to the Constitution. That is, where a man is to be adjudged judicially guilty of wrong-doing, and where the consequence of that act is his punishment by being compelled to suffer in prison or by fine or something else, as a penalty, that has all the attributes of, and comes within the reason of, a criminal proceeding.

Now, if that be true, then the next question is, Ought he to be heard before the House judges him? The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] says this is a House composed of lawyers, of sensible men, who can themselves argue and deliberate and discuss. But the man who is interested in the result may perhaps present reasons which no merely impartial tribunal will think of for themselves. Nobely will deav the gentleman from Indiana does not deave the Nobody will deny—the gentleman from Indiana does not deny—that the man ought to be heard. If we decide, as we very probably may, that this protection of the papers of the individual cannot stand in the way of the public investigations which this House thinks necessary in the discharge of its high constitutional functions, whether of inquest or of legislation, still, before we come to that decision, we wish to hear what the man has to say who is interested in its result, what to fleat what the man has to say who is interested in its result, especially before we enforce that decision by punitive process.

We agree, then, first, that here is an important constitutional right of the citizen to be settled; second, it is a right concerning which he is entitled to be heard. That was settled by this House in the last case of the kind before it, that of the witness Joseph B. Stewart. He was permitted to address the House for an hour on this precise question. I had the honor of being a member of the committee that was investigating matters connected with the Credit Mobilier fraud. The witness Stewart refusing to testify in regard to what he said was his private business, he was brought to the bar of the House and heard for an hour before he was remanded to the custody of the

Then, if he is to be heard, it seems to me it follows as a matter of Then, if he is to be heard, it seems to me it follows as a matter of course that, as the Constitution provides in criminal cases, he ought to have the assistance of counsel for his defense. Many citizens, a very large proportion of the citizens of this country, men, women, and children, are persons absolutely incapable of being heard by their own voice before an audience like this. It is not given to them to have the self-possession, the knowledge of the law is not given to them, the gift of speech is not given to them which would enable them to have a hearing of any practical value except through counsel. If this man is not entitled to be heard by counsel, then the poorest triphyen who has just come over to this country, or the German est Irishman who has just come over to this country, or the German who cannot speak the English language, the woman who would almost faint at the severe aspect of our honorable Speaker bent upon her in displeasure [laughter] would not be any more entitled to be heard through counsel.

The English House of Commons—and certainly the American House of Representatives will not be behind the English House of Commons in its respect for constitutional liberty—the English House of Commons hears the citizen at its bar in civil cases where questions of private right are to be determined. In England, as is well known, Parliament has the power to legislate without restraint; and therefore in many instances it exercises what are in fact judicial functions; that is, it declares by statute between the conflicting rights of parthat is, it declares by statute between the connecting rights of parties. In those cases the citizen is always heard by counsel at the bar of the English House of Commons, and the books on parliamentary law are full of the rules of proceeding in examining witnesses in such cases, as gentlemen know.

Our Constitution does not allow this House to deal with that class of subjects. But here we have a judicial question involving the right of the citizen; and it seems to me, therefore, that he ought certainly to be heard through the mouth of his counsel.

I plant myself on this proposition, that there is no such thing known to American constitutional law, no such thing known to the judicial habits of the American people as punishing a man without a hearing. And there is no such thing as a right to a hearing separated from the right to select the voice through which that hearing shall be had; and that a citizen unable or unwilling to be heard by himself is always entitled to be heard through his counsel.

Mr. JENKS. Mr. Speaker, in mechanics, it is held to be a good rule that no man shall take off the hands of another an unfinished job, unless there be some sufficient reason for it.

Mr. HOAR. Before the gentleman proceeds with his argument, will he allow me to make one suggestion, which I forgot? In the last Congress the Speaker ruled, with the full assent of the House, that when a witness is held under these circumstances he is, like members, limited by the one-hour rule; so that the hearing asked in this case cannot be protracted.

I was about to say that the question now presented is, Shall this witness be heard by counsel before this House? It is not whether any witness shall ever be heard, but whether this particular witness shall or shall not be heard. It is only this individual case that we are called upon to decide; and it is always held unwise in law for a court to step outside of the record and decide a general principle independently of the particular case it is adjudicating.

Hence we will not discuss any supposed violation of the principle of liberty that every man shall be heard by his counsel; but we will merely discuss the question whether this man in this particular case shall be heard by counsel.

If this case were originally being considered by the House and if the witness were giving his testimony directly to the House, it might be proper that he should be heard by counsel. But when this House has delegated his examination to a committee and his examination is there to be taken, it is before the committee that he should be heard by his counsel as to whether he should answer the question or not. When the relevancy of the interrogatory is settled, (and that is now settled,) when that question has been raised before the committee and the committee has reported in full, shall this House take the unfinished job off the hands of this committee and establish the precedent that when the witness has had ample opportunity to be heard before the committee by his counsel the time of the House shall be consumed by hearing counsel again?

If it be true that this witness must be accorded this opportunity, it is true of every other witness who may come before the committee. The consequence would be that all that would be necessary to consume fully the time of this House till next July would be for every witness to prove contumacious and to demand a hearing before the House for an hour, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has sug-gested. In this way our whole time might be occupied with hearing counsel of contumacious witnesses

Now when we have transferred the duty of examining this witness to a committee, when we have authorized them to inquire, when they alone can hear the testimony, I insist that it is before the committee that counsel should be heard on a question of this kind; that the suppose this same principle should be applied to the courts of justice with reference to contempts? In such cases the court itself judges whether the witness is in contempt. You never knew a court to step aside from the issue then trying to get up an issue with a witness whether he was in contempt of that court or not, and hear that question discussed for an hour by counsel for the witness and perhaps for an hour by counsel on the other side. If that were allowed in any court, the judicial process could be obstructed by the contumacy of witnesses in such a way that it would be impossible to attain the ends of justice. Now, the time of this court is just as important as that of any other court of justice. Two hundred and ninety-two men need not sit here to determine whether this man, in refusing to answer questions which this House has already passed upon as relevant, is guilty of contempt, when we have a committee specially constituted to inquire concerning that matter. Hence, although I should be very much pleased personally to hear the honorable gentlemen who would appear as counsel in this case, yet I think such a proceeding would infringe upon what seems to be the judicious rule with respect to cases of this

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, on so grave a subject as this it would be well perhaps for the House to understand exactly the position of the question and the attitude of the witness now brought before us. Let us consider for what this witness is called before the bar of the House by its order. Mr. GLOVER, Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a

Mr. CONGER. I have but a few remarks to make, if the gentleman will allow me to finish.

Mr. GLOVER. The witness desires to withdraw his application to

Mr. GLOVER. The witness desires to withdraw his application to be heard by counsel and to be allowed to have a written argument read from the Clerk's desk; and if that is conceded by the House—

Mr. CONGER. Well, Mr. Speaker, that has no particular bearing upon what I have to say on this case. It may be important as a piece of information, but not otherwise. [Laughter.] The settlement of this grave question and of the duty of the House in connection with it does not depend upon the momentary caprice of the witness as to whether he will be heard by counsel or by a written statement. In pursuance of the order which this House adouted and which the pursuance of the order which this House adopted and which the Speaker has carried out, this witness is called before us. The officer Speaker has carried out, this witness is called before us. The officer of the House is directed to bring him to the bar of the House, for what purpose? To show cause why he should not be punished. He is not brought here to answer the inquiry which the Speaker propounded to him, whether he would reply to the questions asked. The warrant of this House directs that he be brought to the bar for the express purpose of showing cause why he should not be punished for contempt. That being the object, the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] are very applicable to this case. I submit that it is unworthy of the dignity of the House to bring a man before its bar to show cause why he should not be punished without permitting him in some manner to show such cause. If he be able to speak for himself and show that cause to this House, let him do it himself. If he need counsel to show cause why he should not be punished, let him have counsel. If he prefers to make a statement in writing and let the Clerk read it from the desk, let him take that course to show cause. But I do assert here that it would be unprecedented for this House to bring any citizen to its bar and call upon him to show cause why he should not be punished by this House and then to set the seal of silence upon his lips. Therefore I claim, whether there have been precedents or not, that this House should consider the manner in which he may show cause, and permit him to do it in a way which shall most effectually give his reasons why he should not be punished by the House.

The suggestion of the gentleman, showing another way in which he may show this cause, removes perhaps the necessity of further argument—that he should be permitted to do it by counsel on this floor. But I, for one, maintain that whenever a citizen is brought here and is unable to speak for himself, he shall have that opportunity before his liberty is taken away, before he shall be incarcerated—as one witness was for months.

Mr. BRIGHT. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee rises to a point of order, and he will state it.

Mr. BRIGHT. I understand the witness has withdrawn his application to be heard by counsel, and there is nothing pending before the House. The proposition, as I understand it, is to have his reasons purging him from contempt read at the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not able to see in the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee anything requiring him to rule as on a point of order.

Mr. BRIGHT. There is nothing before the House; no question

The SPEAKER. There is a request on the part of a witness that he be heard by written statement, to be read at the Clerk's desk; and on that the gentleman from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. CONGER. The witness at the bar has not ventured to take such part in the proceedings of this House as to make motions or to withdraw motions. I am a little surprised at the point of order raised here by my acute friend, that the witness made this motion or that the witness can withdraw it; and therefore I apprehend that the gentleman merely made his point of order to interrupt the current of genteman merely made in spoint of order to interrupt the current of my remarks, knowing my excessive modesty and the ease with which I am thrown off my guard. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRIGHT. Permit me to explain.

Mr. CONGER. At some private interview I shall be very happy to do so. [Laughter.] I will neither take up the time of the House with the multitudinous explanations of my friend nor admit my inability to perceive them without such great labor bestowed upon them.

Mr. BRIGHT. All right, sir.

Mr. CONGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, whatever the interruptions may be, and whatever he may fail to communicate to the House, this question still remains, that by order of the House and its enforcement by the Speaker's warrant, this witness is brought to the bar of the House and required here in the presence of the House to show cause why punishment should not be inflicted upon him. He has asserted through his friends that he desired to do it by counsel; he has asserted it himself in the presence of the House that he desires to show that cause by his counsel, and by counsel recognized by every gentleman in this House as one well worthy to speak in regard to the rights of a citizen, to his constitutional rights; well worthy to speak in regard to the duty and obligation and precedents of this House; well worthy, I humbly admit, to give instructions on such a subject to me equally with the gentlemen who offer voluntarily to give them.

It is to that point I rose, and that only; and I know not, only from the remarks of the gentlemen of the House, as I have heard nothing from the witness, that he has changed the request he made to the House. That stands made in the House here, and therefore I insist that when that request is made by a citizen it shall be heard, or at least the House shall consider the proposition whether it be not proper and right that he should be heard, if he so desires, by counsel before he is punished.

Mr. PAGE. I made the motion that the witness before the House be heard by his counsel. I did it on my own motion, without any consultation whatever. I did it simply because my idea of justice and fair play has always taught me that no citizen or person should be convicted or punished without first having been heard. If the witness before the House withdraws his application to be heard by his counsel and desires to have a written statement read, I am ready to withdraw my motion; but until I hear such a statement coming from authority on that side I insist on my motion, and demand the revious question. Mr. GARFIELD.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is right; let us settle that question now.
Mr. GARFIELD. I move to lay the gentleman's motion on the table.
Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have a vote.
The House divided; and there were—ayes 110, noes 59.
Mr. PAGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were-yeas 117, nays 74, not voting 98: as follows:

Mr. BANKS. I move that the witness have leave of the House to make his statement in writing, to be read from the Clerk's desk.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The witness is at liberty now to make such a statement, HALLET KILBOURN (the witness) said: I beg to submit this paper as my answer.

The Clerk read the paper handed him by Mr. Kilbourn, as follows:

To the House of Representatives :

A committee of your body has expressed its determination to report me as a contumacious witness. You will probably be moved to pun-ish me for this supposed offense. I beg you to hear my simple statement before you strike.

I am sure that neither the House nor the committee, nor anybody else concerned in this business, has any desire to do me a wanton injury or to invade my just rights. I am equally free from all intent to violate or evade the duty which I owe to the House. So far from any actual contempt of your honorable body, I have the profoundest respect for its authority when exercised within legal limits. I do not permit myself to doubt for a moment that whatever you do will be done in good faith according to your apprehension of law, justice, and constitutional liberty.

I am charged with refusing to answer a pertinent and proper question propounded to me by the committee. If this be true I have committed a criminal offense, but before I can be punished for it my guilt must be established upon a legal trial. Where shall the trial be had and who are my judges?

I admit that this House as well as the Senate had originally the power to try and punish for all contempts that might be committed against it; and as to contempts generally, each House is still in the possession of the same jurisdiction which it had from the beginning. But as regards the particular offense which a witness commits by re-Statutes, page 17, have declared it to be an indictable misdemeanor, and transferred the whole power of trial and punishment to the criminal courts of the District. You can legally do nothing but certify through your Speaker the facts found by the committee, and leave the case to be dealt with by the District attorney, the grand jury, and the court. It will not be asserted that this law is void. No one will say that the two Houses of Congress had not the right to disarm themselves of a power which they thought might be better placed in the hands of the judicial authorities. This being done by the concurrence of both Houses and the approval of the Executive in the solemn form of a law, it is to be obeyed like any other law. It is of universal application and must be followed in all cases which come within its purview. The provisions of it by express words are for "every person who being summoned" refuses, &c., and prescribe what is to be done "whenever" a witness fails to testify. There is no rule of interpretation which will make my case an exception out of a statute so broad in its terms. Nor will it do to say that this is not the exclusive mode of proceeding. Disobedience to the lawful process of this House is a public offense—a contempt. A hearing of the case before this body is a trial. A judgment against the accused party is a conviction. Imprisonment in pursuance of such conviction is execution. To punish a man here, and then send him to the courts to be punished again, would be a flat violation of the Constitution. The jurisdiction belongs exclusively either to the House or to the court. If one has it, the other has it not. The written law delares that it belongs to the court, and not to the House. I do not say that this law is a wise one. Perhaps it cripples the power of this body, where it ought to be strengthened. It is your business to say whether it shall be repealed or not. But while it remains on the statute-book you will not refuse to obey it.

The history of the legislation on this subject will satisfy you that my interpretation of the statute now in force is correct. In 1857 (Statutes at Large, page 155) it was enacted that a witness guilty of this offense "shall, in addition to the pains and penalties now existthis offense "snail, in addition to the pains and penalties now existing, be liable to indictment as and for a misdemeanor." This left the House in possession of its old power, and the provision for superadding another punishment was unconstitutional. In 1862 it was repealed. (See 12 Statutes at Large, page 335.) In 1874, upon a general revision of the statutes, the present law was passed, which gives the jurisdiction entirely to the courts, and authorizes them to inflict, not an additional punishment, but the only one that can be inflicted for the effects at the solution of the term of the statutes for the offense. It is not to be doubted that the words "in addition," &c., which the act of 1857 contains, were designedly left out of the revised code so as to bring it within the Constitution, by providing for one trial and one punishment only, and giving exclusive power to the court.

Let me remind you again that you are sitting as a criminal tribunal, to try me for a supposed offense against the United States. If you have jurisdiction, your decision is final, and must be conclusively taken as right. But if the power you exercise does not legally belong to you, then your judgment of conviction will be as void as the decision of a lynch court of the power power and it is a supposed to the power power and the power power power power and the power ion of a lynch court or a military commission, and it cannot be executed without making your officer a trespasser.

But I will make no conflict with the authority of this House unless I am driven to it by the stress of sheer necessity for the preservation of my undeniable rights. It is easy to bring this affair to a plain issue. If the committee or the House will find and assert the truth of any fact which connects the real-estate pool with any public interest which it is the duty of Congress to protect, you shall at once have all the information I can give you about its nature and history. I have asserted on oath that it is purely a private transaction, having no connection, direct or indirect, with any public affair or with the official conduct of any officer. The truth of my statement is made manifest by all the facts which are known, and nothing is even alleged from which a contrary inference can be reasonably drawn.

Now let the question be squarely presented. If the committee or the Househas any well-grounded reason to believe that the production of my private papers or the revelation of my private business will promote any public interest or remedy any public wrong, and if either the committee or the House will assert that to be true as matter of fact, the House and all its committees shall have whatever is demanded, or if any private individual will make oath that the papers asked for will lead to the detection of any misgovernment or the exposure of wickedness in high places, they shall be open as day to your inspection. On the other hand, I cannot acknowledge the naked arbitrary right of the House to investigate private business, in which nobody but me and my customers have any concern, my customers have any concern,

Thus far it is not alleged that my papers will prove official corruption anywhere. Jay Cooke & Co.'s connection with the pool has long ago been fully and satisfactorily explained, and no new light could possibly be thrown on it by the publication of other names. The deposit made by the Secretary of the Navy with the London house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. is certainly useless or worse, for it cannot be pretended that the pool had anything to do with that.

But it is alleged that the United States, being a creditor of Jay Cooke & Co. have an interest in showing that the trustee who settled with & Co., have an interest in showing that the trustee who settled with as Co., have an interest in snowing that the trustee who settled with us for that share of the pool got less than he ought to have received. I assert that the United States are otherwise secured; that Mr. Lewis did get all he was entitled to, and I deny that the fairness of his settlement with us can be impugned by any facts sought in this investigation. But assume that these things are true, what has Congress to do with them? The bankrupt court alone has authority to furnish the remedy for a wrong like this. There and there only can a complaint be heard against the settlement made by the trustee. Do you propose to take away the jurisdiction of the court and assume it yourselves? Will you set aside the agreement of the parties by an act of Congress? Admitting for the argument's sake that my papers may be legal evidence in some possible controversy before a judicial tri-bunal, does that justify an unreasonable search of them now by order of this body for the purposes of an investigation to which they have no relevancy whatever?

I am far from desiring to stand in the way of any investigation you may please to make concerning public affairs. On the contrary, I will freely give you all the aid I can. But I cannot submit to an examination of my private business unless some public reason be assigned for it. If the House insists, I must take the consequences.

I solemnly trust that the whole House will see the gross injustice of either certifying me to the district attorney for prosecution or of convicting me here.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the particular questions which the witness refused to answer may be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now propound to the witness the questions to which answers by him have been refused.

Mr. Kilbourn, are you now prepared to answer, upon the demand of the proper committee of the House, "where each of these five members reside," meaning the members of the pool?

The WITNESS. No, Mr. Speaker; I respectfully decline for the reasons I have heretofore given.

The SPEAKER. In your statement?
The WITNESS. Yes, sir.
The SPEAKER. Are you prepared to answer any of the questions which follow that one?

The WITNESS. I beg respectfully to decline.
The SPEAKER. For the same reasons?
The WITNESS. Yes, sir.
The SPEAKER. Are you prepared to produce, in obedience to the subpana duces tecum, the records which you have been required by the committee to produce?

The WITNESS. Not at present.
The SPEAKER. You decline for the same reasons?

Yes, sir.

The WITNESS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GLOVER. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and upon it demand the previous question. It is due to the House to say that if that resolution should be adopted it will be followed by another resolution in exact accordance with the precedents of the House.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Hallet Kilbourn, having been heard by the House pursuant to the order heretofore made requiring him to show cause why he should not answer questions propounded to him by a committee, and respond to the subpena duces tecum by obeying the same, and having failed to show sufficient cause why he should not answer said questions and obey said subpena duces tecum, be, and is therefore, considered in contempt of the House because of said failure.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest that the words of that resolution are not in accordance with the order made by the House, and that perhaps it would be better to conform to the order; the order was that he should appear before the House and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt. I think the House should keep within its own

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GLOVER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GLOVER. I now offer the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

demand the previous question:

Resolved. That in purging himself of the contempt for which Hallet Kilbourn is now in custody, the said Kilbourn shall be required to state to the House whether he is now willing to appear before the committee of the House to whom he has hitherto declined to obey a certain subpoena duces tecum and answer certain questions and obey said subpoena duces tecum, and make answer to said questions; and if he answers that he is ready to appear before said committee and obey said subpoena duces tecum and answer said questions then said witness shall have the privilege to so appear and obey and answer forthwith or so soon as said committee can be convened; and that in the mean time the witness remain in custody; and in the event that said witness shall answer that he is not ready to so appear before said committee and obey said subpoena duces tecum and make answer to said questions as aforesaid, then that said witness be recommitted to the said custody for the continuance of such contempt; and that such custody shall continue until the said witness shall communicate to this House, through said committee, that he is ready to appear before said committee and make such answer and obey said subpoena duces tecum, and that in executing this order the Sergeant-t-Arms shall cause the said Kilbourn to be kept in his custody in the common jail of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me to make

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me to make

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me to make a suggestion as to a matter of practice?

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. STONE demanded the regular order.

Mr. HOAR. I want to make a suggestion in regard to one sentence of his commitment. It provides that the witness shall be committed until he signifies to the committee his willingness to answer the questions propounded to him. Ought it not to be "until the further order of the House?" Suppose the witness shall express a willingness to the committee to appear and testify, and should then, after being released, refuse to testify?

Mr. HOLMAN. That is all implied.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the gentleman will insert the words "until further order of the House."

Mr. HOLMAN. That results inevitably.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman will see that this resolution proposes to discharge the witness on his expressing his willingness to testify before the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. He has to come here to signify that willingness, and those words are not necessary in the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Well, if you do not want to do it I do not care about it. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. GLOVER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. DURHAM, (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 15, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KERNAN. I present the petition of a large number of lawyers and some of the judges of the southern and eastern districts of New York, praying that a law be enacted providing for the appointment of stenographers for the courts of the United States in the southern and eastern districts of New York. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN presented a memorial of the Seneca Nation of Indians, in the State of New York, remonstrating against the passage of a law transferring the guardianship and property of said Indians by the United States Government to the State of New York; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying for the establishment of a post-route from Marine Mills, Washington County, Minnesota, to Osceola Mills, Polk County, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and

Mr. HARVEY presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the grant of a right of way through the Indian Territory to two certain lines of railroads; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in relation to certain Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed. He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the passage of an act to protect public highways; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of N. H. Vansandt, of Richmond, Virginia, late of the United States Navy, praying for the re-moval of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of P. A. Owen, late a captain in the Ninth United States Infantry, praying the passage of a bill authorizing the President to restore him to his former rank in the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying the passage of a law granting the right of way to the owners of the Thomas and Ruckle and Meacham wagon-roads through the public lands in Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Daniel L.

Maniner and 886 others, of Taos County, New Mexico, praying that Congress disapprove a special law passed by the Legislature of that Territory to fill the vacancy in the judgeship of the probate court of that county by appointment of the governor instead of electing that officer by a vote of the people; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented the petition of Henry W. Hoffman, late collector, &c., of the port of Baltimore, Maryland, praying to be relieved from liability for certain losses occasioned by the dishonesty of one of his clerks; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Reid, of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying compensation for military supplies furnished to the United States in July, 1863, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John G. Worthington, of Fairfax County, Virginia, praying compensation for twenty-five hundred cords of wood, alleged to have been cut upon and taken from his premises during the late war by an agent of the United States Government under authority from an officer of the Quartermaster's Department, to submit an adverse report thereon, and ask that the claim be disallowed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed and the committee discharged from the further consideration of the petition,

if there be no objection.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask that the report be laid upon the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will lie on the table.
Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas P. Jordan, praying compensation for certain corn taken by the military authorities in June, 1865, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Patrick Eagin, in his own right and as administrator of the estate of William Donnelly, deceased, praying payment for four hundred and forty-one bales of cotton said to have been taken by the military authorities of the United States at Wilmington, North Carolina, and for certain liquors alleged to have been sold to the United States, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 600) to extend the time for the completion of certain railroads in Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 601) providing for appeals from United States district to United States circuit courts in causes of a criminal nature; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 602) for the relief of Captain P. A. Owen; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to intro-

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 603) to establish a post-route in Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S.No. 604) for the relief of James L. High; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CUSTOMS COLLECTIONS IN ALASKA.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish for the information of the Senate the report of William G. Morris, special agent, upon the Territory of Alaska, and the collection of customs revenue therein.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Harvey & Livesey be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. HARVEY, it was Ordered, That the petition of John Birkett be taken from the files of the Senate and, with the accompanying and additional papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SARGENT, it was Ordered. That the heirs of Augustus Ford have leave to withdraw their papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. WHYTE, it was Ordered. That the petition and papers in the case of Henry W. Hoffman, of Cumberland, Maryland, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Finance.

LIEUTENANT BENJAMIN L. CORNISH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions, the Calendar of unobjected cases will now be taken up at the point

The CHIEF CLERK. The first bill on the Calendar at the point indicated is the bill (S. No. 560) for the relief of Benjamin L. Cornish, late second lieutenant of the Thirty-second Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Benjamin L. Cornish, late second lieutenant in the Thirty-second Regiment of Wisconsin Nate second neutenant in the Thirty-second Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers, of the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant of infantry from the 11th of November, 1864, to the 12th June, 1865, during which time he actually performed duty and was regularly commissioned as second lieutenant, but was not mustered in, deducting whatever amount, if any, shall have been paid to him for his services in the Army during the time specified.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAJOR JUNIUS T. TURNER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 561) for the relief of Major Junius T. Turner; which was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Junius T. Turner, of Washington, late captain in the Third Regiment of Maryland Cavalry Volunteers, of such sum as shall equal the travel-pay of a captain of volunteers from Washington to San Francisco, such distance to be computed by the nearest traveled route.

Mr. DAVIS. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There seems to be no report.

Mr. DAVIS. I think we ought to have the bill explained.

Mr. DAVIS. I think we ought to have the bill explained.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was reported by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. SPENCER,] who is not now in his seat.
Mr. SHERMAN. Unless there is a report I think the bill ought to

Mr. LOGAN. I can explain to the Senate the point of this bill. I do not know whether the report has been printed or not, but I have a recollection of the bill. I have no objection to its going over, how-ever. This man was enlisted in San Francisco and was discharged in Washington. Under the law, soldiers are entitled to mileage to the point of enlistment from where they are discharged; and this case comes under that provision of the law. It is all right; but I am willing it should go over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that there is

Mr. DAVIS. I would ask the Senator from Illinois why, if the law be as he has stated, this man was not paid under the law, without requiring a special act?

Mr. LOGAN. That is a question I cannot answer. A great many things come under the provisions of law which are not paid without special acts. If there is a report, let it be read, and that will explain it.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. Spen-CER December 15, 1874:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 845) for the relief of Junius T. Turner, having had the same under consideration, submit the relief of Junius T. Turner, having had the same under consideration, submit the following report:

This is a bill to pay petitioner the travel-pay of a captain of volunteers from Washington, District of Columbia, to San Francisco, California, the latter place being the place of enlistment and home, the former the place of discharge. It appears this officer was denied such travel-pay because of transfer from one regiment to another, he having been discharged from the regiment in which he enlisted to accept a commission as an officer in a Maryland regiment, the Department ruling that he had, by such transfer, forfeited his claim for expenses of travel. This construction is severe and inequitable, and should not be regarded as a forfeiture, or a contravention of section 15, act January 29, 1813. (See extract of act accompanying report.) This officer is entitled to the travel-pay claimed, and the committee recommend passage of bill.

This officer is entitled to the travel-pay claimed, and the committee recommend passage of bill.

Section 15, act approved January 29, 1813, reads as follows, namely:

"That whenever any officer or soldier shall be discharged from the service, except by way of punishment for an offense, he shall be allowed his pay and rations, or an equivalent in money, for such term of time as shall be sufficient for him to travel from the place of discharge to the place of his residence, computing at the rate of twenty miles to a day."

Section 5, act July 22, 1861, reads as follows, namely:

"And be it enacted. That the officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, organized as above set forth, shall, in all respects, be placed on the footing, as to pay and allowances, of similar corps of the regular Army."

The above-recited law stands unrepealed upon the statutes and remains in full force and effect.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CITIZENS' BUILDING COMPANY.

Mr. INGALLS. Senate bill No. 401 was partially considered yesterday morning and laid over at the expiration of the morning hour pending a motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Sherman,] who offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 401) to incorporate the Citizens' Building Company of Washington.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill having been read yesterday morning in the hearing of the Senate, the question, I suppose, would recur upon the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. I ask that it be reported by the Clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute will be reported. The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That section 553 of the act authorizing incorporations in the District of Columbia shall be held to extend to and include building associations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It should be "section 553 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia," giving the exact designation of the statute, I think.

Mr. INGALLS. I have made some inquiry in relation to the nature of this organization, and am convinced that the object which I beof this organization, and am convinced that the object which I believe the Senator from Ohio has in view cannot be reached by the amendment that he has submitted. This association of gentlemen known as the Citizens' Building Company of Washington was organized for the purpose of improving a square of ground in this city by the construction of ninety dwelling-houses upon it. The stock is divided into five hundred and twenty-five shares, which are already subscribed and held by about four hundred persons. From this fact alone arises the necessity for an act of incorporation, the number of persons being so great and their interests so diversified that it is impossible for them to conduct the enterprise under the forms of an ordinary sible for them to conduct the enterprise under the forms of an ordinary business partnership.

I would call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Dawes,] who objected yesterday to the bill, to the fact that there are no special privileges conferred in the proposed act which we are now considering. It is an association for the purpose of enabling poor men to obtain homes by the payment of a small monthly sum amounting under the by-laws and constitution of this organization to $10 per month; and, as I said before, the reason why it is impossible to conduct this under the forms of a partnership is from the fact that there are about four hundred stockholders. I would call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that the object cannot be accomplished by an amendment to the chapter of the Revised Statutes to which he has referred, because that chapter contains certain provisions which are inconsistent with the purposes and objects these gentlemen have in view. For instance, the five hundred and fifty-sixth section in the last clause declares All the elections shall be by ballot, and each stockholder shall be entitled to as many votes as he owns shares of stock in the company, and the persons receiving the greatest number of votes shall be trustees.

In this case, the object being to enable poor men to obtain homes by a small monthly payment, the purpose would be very largely defeated if the persons who owned more than one share of stock were entitled to more than one vote in the corporation; and the by-laws and the constitution which they have already adopted limit the number of votes to one for each stockholder irrespective of the number of shares that he may be the owner of.

It shall be lawful for the trustees to call in and demand from the stockholders all such sums of money by them subscribed at such times and in such installments as the trustees shall deem proper, under the penalty of forfeiting the shares of stock subscribed for and all previous payments made thereon, if payment shall not be made by the stockholder within sixty days after a personal demand or a notice requiring such payment shall have been published for six successive weeks in a newspaper in the District.

The object is not to accomplish a forfeiture of these shares; but wherever by misfortune or inability a stockholder is unable to pay the amount that is due upon the stock or the share held by him, a forfeiture of fifty cents per menth has been agreed upon by these gentlemen as the only forfeiture that shall be collected; and if they are to organize or to attempt to organize under the provisions of the general law, they cannot by their constitution and by-laws make a provision that shall be in conflict with this statute. The effect of that would be to deprive the very men who are entitled to the benefits of this law from all the advantages they could derive under it. There is another objection also in section 564, which declares

The capital stock so fixed and limited shall be paid in, one-half within one year, and the other half thereof within two years from the incorporation of the company, or such corporation shall be dissolved.

The object being as I say to enable these poor men to obtain a home by a small monthly payment of $10, if that provision is to apply to the association, of course they cannot carry out the object for which they are organized, because it is supposed that under the operation of this law, by the monthly payments, the forfeitures, and the profits to be derived from the buildings that are constructed and sold, the association will be able to be wound up in from five to seven years, and not within two years, as section 564 prescribes.

I therefore think, sir, that the act of incorporation is entirely innocent: that it is even to upon of the objections urged by either the cent; that it is open to none of the objections urged by either the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Ohio; and I understand that the gentlemen composing the association are entirely willing that the liability clause shall be inserted if it be so desired. I trust, therefore, that this amendment may be withdrawn and that the bill may be amended, if the Senator from Vermont still insists, by inserting the provision fixing the liability of the stockholders to the amount of stock held by them, and that with that amendment the bill may pass as reported by the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the people of Ohio, like the people of nearly all the States, have had a great deal of experience of special legislation in favor of corporations, and their experience has led them to the conclusion that it was unwise in any case where private interto the conclusion that it was unwise in any case where private interest was involved to charter special corporations; and the constitution of Ohio, made over a quarter of a century ago, in 1850, after a long experience with special corporations, absolutely forbade them; so that it is not now possible in the State of Ohio to organize a private corporation except under and in pursuance of general laws. I believe that is the experience of nearly all the States of the Union; in those that I am familiar with at least they have adopted general incorporation laws. Some years ago we were troubled and much of our time was occupied in passing private bills for the benefit of the people of this District, and some of the most peculiar organizations in the way of corporations have been created here that can be found probably on any statute-book. One that is just brought to my mind by recent circumstances is the charter of a cemetery association that is now a close and absolute monopoly, so that three or four men own a grave-yard where thousands of bodies are buried, and absolutely prevent and prohibit people managing their own property in their own way, or burying the dead in that ground except on the terms they them-selves prescribe for pecuniary considerations; and yet it is organized

There are other corporations created in this District under laws passed hurriedly by Congress, probably upon some plausible pretext, which are grossly wrong in their character, wrong in their purposes, and wrong in their details. Therefore it was that a few years ago, when the general bill that I propose to extend was introduced, I re garded it with great pleasure as a progress in the legislation of this District to require all corporations to be organized under general law, and to conform to certain general principles which by experience had been shown to be proper and necessary in the organization of private corporations. Since that time we have been but very little disturbed by applications for private acts of incorporation; or, when we have passed any, they have generally either been wrong, or were to meet cases that were not provided for by the general statute.

When this bill was introduced, and it was said that building associations did not come under the provisions of the general incorporation act, I thought that was wrong; because building associations in modern times are a great convenience, especially in securing to poor people homes at a moderate cost; and therefore a building association people homes at a moderate cost; and therefore a building association is just as much an object of usefulness as a mining corporation or a manufacturing corporation or any other corporation. Here is a corporation to erect buildings, to improve a square. It is a proper object of association, but such associations ought to be governed by the general law. If we extend to persons engaged in building associations the same facilities, the same provisions that we do to manufacturing and all other private corporations, we give them all the facilities we ought to give, and that is the amendment I propose. I do not know that it is antly worded; it may be necessary to change it; but as a that it is aptly worded; it may be necessary to change it; but as a matter of course the Committee on the District of Columbia can do matter of course the Committee on the District of Columbia can do that. But it seems to me we ought not to pass any private act of incorporation for this purpose unless it conforms to the general law. To incorporate building associations on peculiar terms, giving them peculiar facilities, I think is wrong. All the objections that are made now by the Senator from Kansas can be easily met by what is called a trusteeship. If this is merely an effort to improve a particular square of ground, and that square is owned by a number of persons, and that want some means by which they can act in concert, the and they want some means by which they can act in concert, the proper way is to select from among them or from among the citizens of the District some trustee who, under defined, prescribed regulations, may act as the trustee for all the parties. There can be no difficulty in these parties joining together and prescribing terms and conditions which shall regulate the conduct of the trustee just as well as the law can do it, and much better. Then the courts of the District can enforce the provisions creating the trust and the terms and conditions agreed upon. It seems to me that the object, if there is anything peculiar in the object to be attained by this bill, can be better accomplished by the voluntary act of persons interested in this square of ground through a trustee rather than through a cor-poration. But at all events I shall not myself vote for any private corporation in this District where the scope, the purpose, the object can be carried out by a general act of incorporation or by the general law now 'upon the statute-book rather than by special acts of incorporation. If we once open the door again to the passage of private acts of incorporation in this District, there will be no end to the special legislation we shall be called upon to pass.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President if Lunderstand the Senator from Kon-

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, if I understand the Senator from Kanas correctly he states, and I think very clearly, the reasons why the persons who want to be incorporated in this instance may not well exercise their powers under the general law. If that be so, it furnishes a ground why this bill should be passed outside of the general law, or if it is to come within the provisions of the general law, then the general law itself should be changed. As one individual, I have no difficulties whatever in relation to creating corporations for the purpose of facilitating the modes of doing business to gentlemen who wish to engage in it. I only ask, so far as I am concerned, that the provisions which are contained in any act of incorporation shall be, first, such as will give the facilities desired, and second, protect the rights of all others. In looking at this bill it seems to me that it is defective in three particulars, and I rise to make the suggestion to the Senator who has it in charge; one, however, I understand him to say that he will himself propose to insert: First, The bill should contain what we call an individual-liability clause. If the parties do business as copartners, they are each responsible for all the debts of the copartnership. If they are incorporated, it seems to me if they are each held responsible individually, in addition to the stock, to an amount equal to that, it is a hardship of which they have no right to complain, and it is an obligation that we should impose upon them. Second, I think there should be incorporated in the bill, to save all trouble, a provision giving to Congress the power to alter, or amend, or repeal this act at any time if they see fit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does not the bill contain that clause?

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir.

And, third, there should be a provision in it, in my judgment, prohibiting their doing business in any way or manner outside the limits of this District; for while under the decisions of the courts the power might be doubtful, they might attempt to and perhaps by law could exercise powers and duties under this corporation outside of the limits of the District. With those three amendments to the bill, I shall vote for it very cheerfully. Without them, I cannot vote for it.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, in the remarks which I made yesterday in reference to this bill, of course the Senator from Kansas will understand that I had no hostility either to the gentlemen who are named as corporators, or to the object designed by the proposition to incorporate them. What I said was designed as a general suggestion. I felt then, and I still feel, that the objections which I submitted to the Senate yesterday were sound, and that, in some respects, the Senator has not removed them. I agree with the Senator from Ohio, and had probably been prompted very much by the experience which the Senator from Ohio has had here. There have crept upon the statute-book, in reference to the District of Columbia, some of the most pernicious corporate powers that are found on any statute-book in the country; and under cover of uncertain phraseology which it seemed impossible that anybody could adopt accidentally, powers have been granted heretofore in the District of Columbia that it would seem to me Congress never, with their eyes open, could have been induced to agree to; and under the cover of apparently harmless phraseology and for purposes wide from the titles of bills and the general current of phraseology, business has been carried on in all parts of the coununder the corporate powers of corporations instituted here in the District of Columbia where it was supposed legislation for the business interests of the country was least of all to be centered.

A word now in reference to this special corporation. A building association, properly managed, in the hands of sagacious, wise, and prudent men, has, I have no doubt, been of beneficial interest to men of limited means, saving up from month to month a small portion of their earnings; but, while that is true, building associations have also been pitfalls into which honest men have been drawn by the management of other people to lose all they had and be bound to fulfill engagements they did not know what they were. And therefore I would not want to incorporate a building association under any general law, for its whole working for good or for evil would depend upon the character of its officers. I am informed that there are many private associations in this very District to-day carrying on building associations which happen to be in the hands of prudent and wise men that are doing a great deal of good in that way; but if you put it into the power of a corporation and select men by a majority of shares or in any way of that kind, the poorest, the least able to defend and protect themselves, those most needing the beneficial results of such an association, will be the last to receive them.

I desire to co-operate with the Senator from Kansas in putting this of the evils I apprehend. I think I should be willing to vote for it if he would put two provisions in, one that the liability of all these stockholders shall be equal to the amount of their stock—

Mr. INGALLS. I shall move that amendment.

Mr. DAWES. And put that upon the face of every paper they issue, by enactment in the statute, so that they cannot deceive anybody about that. And then provide that in a reasonable time the whole thing shall be wound up, so that nobody shall get a square of ground or any amount of real estate in this city and hold it in perpetuity, in defiance of the most beneficial of all the laws of the land, that which distributes the estates of persons in due time among their heirs and friends.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Committee on the District of Columbia had not been satisfied that the object sought to be accomplished by this bill could not be obtained under the general incorporation act, the bill would never have been reported. I am as much opposed as the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Ohio to encumbering the statute-books with special incorporation acts conferring peculiar mixilizers when the objects expect to be attained can be accomprivileges, when the objects sought to be attained can be accom-plished under general law. But I think it has been sufficiently shown that this is a case which is outside of the general law as it now stands. It is very true that the act providing for incorporations might be amended so as to apply to building associations organized as this is; but until that is accomplished it is impossible for these gentlemen to carry out their laudable and legal purposes in the way suggested by the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio. I am entirely willing and shall move that the bill be amended by providing for the individual liability of the stockholders to the amount of the stock held by each one, and I shall also propose at the proper time—I think I cannot do it now-to add a section, five, in the following language:

The corporation hereby created shall have no authority to transact business outside of the District of Columbia; and Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

I think that this amendment will substantially meet all the objections that have been urged against the bill; and I therefore express the hope that the Senate will refuse to agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, and that I may then have leave to offer the amendments I have indicated already, and that, thus may need the bill may need.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to enable the Senator from Kansas to perfect the bill, I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio is withdrawn.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I am opposed to special acts of incorporation. We have had sufficient experience in my State and section to make me an opponent of such acts. I would suggest to the Senator from Karsas, who finds it necessary to have two, three, or four amendments before this bill will be satisfactory even to himself, why not amend the general law, if it needs amendment, so that these peo ple may incorporate themselves under that? I have not examined the general law, but it strikes me, from what has been said by the Senator from Kansas, that with very little amendment of it these people could organize under that law.

If the door is once opened to special acts of incorporation, when will it be closed? It is good policy, has been so found in numbers of the States, to stop passing special acts of incorporation, and to extend the provisions of their general laws so that all and every class of industries may be brought within their grasp. I see no reason why there cannot be such an amendment to the general law here as will enable these gentlemen to organize thereunder, and thus avoid what I regard as a very great evil.

Mr. INGALLS. The only objection to the course suggested by the Senator from Connecticut in relation to the amendment of the general law is that it would require the repeal or essential modification of certain provisions that are wholesome and necessary as applied to the corporations provided for in that general act, but that would be fatal to the accomplishment of the results which are desired to be accomplished by the bill now under consideration. I am not aware that any special evil could result to anybody from the passage of this bill. Its purposes are beneficent; its objects are recognized as among the most humane and valuable of modern business transactions, in permitting men of small means and small income and small monthly and annual compensation to devote a certain portion of their earnings in secur-ing homes for themselves, which they would otherwise be debarred from obtaining; and I can see no objection to the passage of this bill with the amendments that have been suggested by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] As the amendment of the Senator from Ohio has been withdrawn, I will now move to amend the bill by inserting an individual liability clause, as follows, at the end of section 4:

Provided. That the provisions of section 562 of the Revised Statutes in relation to the liability of stockholders shall extend to and be made applicable to the stockholders in the corporation created by this act.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Kansas and to the Senate, that it seems to me that the difficulties which seem to surround this question might all be solved by taking an intermediate the Senator from Ohio for the reason that the provisions of the law as they stand at present are inapplicable to building associations.

Mr. INGALLS. That amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand, however, it is withdrawn for the purpose of allowing amendments to be made to the bill to perfect it; and will probably be renewed. But whether that be so or not, the and will probably be renewed. But whether that be so or not, the suggestion I have to make is nevertheless in point. I understand the objection to it arises from the fact, as already stated, that the general law as it stands at present is inapplicable to building associations. Now I think there is a feeling on the part of the Senate that, if possible, we should avoid these special acts of incorporation. I think it is true now in many of the States that by constitutional provision the Legislature is inhibited from passing special acts of incorporation, but all corporations are organized under the general law.

As the law stands at present in this District provisions are made for

As the law stands at present in this District provisions are made for corporations not for pecuniary profit; those for pecuniary profit; and there are also corporations provided for cemetery purposes, and perhaps for some other purposes; and there are provisions in the general law peculiar to these several different kinds of corporations, based upon the business in which they may engage. Now I suggest that there may be two or three sections added to the general law having in view the organization of building associations, and putting provisions in the general law that are peculiar to such associations; and if there be difficulty, as the law stands now, in the amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio, or the proposition to make the general law applicable to corporations for building purposes, you can have three or four sections added to the general law under which all building associations can organize, instead of having a special act, as is proposed here, and that upon the same principle, as the law stands now, we have different provisions, depending upon the objects and purposes of the corporation. As already suggested, we have corporations not for pecuniary profit, and we have one class of regulations for them; we have corporations for pecuniary profit, and we have another class of regulations for them. But it is said that the class of regulations applied to the last class are not applicable to building associations for the reasons stated. Now, why not have a general law under which all building associations can organize, instead of passing a special law in this case, and next year passing a special law for another case? That is the suggestion I have to make.

Mr. INGALLS. I see no objection to the general course proposed by the Senator from Iowa. I think it would be highly appropriate that a general law should be passed permitting the incorporation of building associations. The difficulty in this case, however, arises from the fact that these gentlemen, supposing that they could organ-ize under the general act, or that if they could not so organize they could carry on their business as a partnership or by trustees, proceeded to purchase the tract of ground that is named in the bill at an expense of about $100,000. They have already constructed nine houses that have been sold under the regulations provided by their constitution and by-laws. The number of stockholders is 400; the number of shares is 525; the monthly payments are $10; and it is absolutely essential in order to the accomplishment and securing of their legal rights that they should have the benefits of an act of incorpora-

If the bill were open to any of the objections which have been urged, if the bill conferred any special privileges, if there were lying latent or lurking obscurely within it any of the banking or other privileges that have been exercised by other corporations, I should say certainly let the bill be defeated or its consideration postponed or delayed; but, when the facts are all stated—and the objects are certainly admitted to be humane and beneficent—I can see no reason why they should be denied the benefits of this act of incorporation which they now ask, leaving the subject of a general law to be considered

Mr. WRIGHT. Allow me to ask a question in that connection for information. Do I understand that this bill proposes to validate the action of these parties so far, or will they have to take new steps for the purpose of organizing?

Mr. INGALLS. This bill incorporates the gentlemen named and their associates, and confers upon them the one distinct and simple authority to exercise "the corporate powers usually enjoyed, such as are required to enable them to purchase, take, hold, and convey square 363, in Washington City, District of Columbia, and to improve the same by building dwelling-houses thereon, and to sell and convey them to stockholders or others for the benefit of the stockholders;" and provides further that, when the improvement of the square is completed, the dwellings sold, and the proceeds distributed, then the company shall cease to exist. There could be nothing more simple and innocent than that.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand they have already purchased this square, but I ask, has the title been taken in the name of the prospective company?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not know.

Mr. WRIGHT. Or in the name of the individual owners, or of some one person in trust for all?

Mr. INGALLS. I cannot answer any of these specific questions.

Mr. WRIGHT. So that in any event the probabilities are, if this bill shall be passed, they must needs have the title made to the new corporation.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no information whatever on the subject to which the question of the Senator from Iowa relates.

Mr. WRIGHT. If that be so, I can see but little more difficulty in having a general law and organizing under it, so far as the title is concerned, than in passing this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be reported again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of section 4-Provided. That the provisions of section 562 of the Revised Statutes in relation to the liability of stockholders shall extend to and be made applicable to the officers and stockholders in the corporation created by this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think that amendment will quite effectuate the object we have in view and that the Senator from Kansas has in view. That single section applies only to one branch of liabilities, and those merely of stockholders alone, that until the capital stock is paid up they shall be liable. There are other sections of the general law relating to the withdrawing of capital and the making of dividends when there are debts still outstanding, which are of great importance to creditors of corporations. I therefore venture to move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Kansas by strik-ing out all after the word "that" and inserting—

The provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia relating to the liability of the officers and stockholders of corporations shall apply to the officers and stockholders of said corporation.

That is the corporation named in the bill. That I think will cover the subject of liability to the extent that the general law covers it.

Mr. INGALLS. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas accepts the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. The question then is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In compliance with the suggestion made by the Senator from Maine, and in order to obviate any possible objection that may be urged against the bill, I offer as an additional section, to be numbered 5, the following:

The corporation hereby created shall have no authority to transact business outside of the District of Columbia; and Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURCHASE OF LAND AT KEY WEST.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills on the Calendar will be proceeded with.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 391) to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase for the use of the United States a parcel of land at Key West, Florida, now the property of Walter C. Maloney and wife, which was considered as in Committee of the

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof to

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase, for the use of the United States, at a price which shall be agreed upon between him and the owners, and not to exceed a reasonable sum, a certain parcel or tract of land belonging to W. C. Maloney and wife, lying and situated on the island of Key West, Florida, and adjoining the military reservation on said island: Provided, That the title of said parties to said property shall be found to be in all respects good and valid in law and equity,

SEC. 2. That if the Secretary of War and the owners of said property shall be unable to agree upon a price to be paid by the United States for said land, or if for any reason the United States shall fail to acquire the title to the same within a reasonable time after the passage of this act, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to cause the possession of said property, or such port of it as is now or may be occupied by the United States, to be restored to the owners thereof.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report?

or may be occupied by the United States, to be restored to the owners thereof.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report?

Mr. COCKRELL. There is a report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. Cock RELL from the Committee on Military Affairs on the 7th instant:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 391) to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase for the use of the United States a parcel of land at Key West, Florida, have considered the same and submit the following report:

This bill authorizes the Secretary of War to purchase a tract of land on the island of Key West, Florida, adjoining the military reservation.
Walter C. Maloney, ir., addressed a letter to Senator C. W. Jones touching this matter, in words as follows, to wit:

KEY WEST, FLORIDA, November 6, 1875.

KEY WEST, FLORIDA, November 6, 1875.

water C. Maloney, Jr., addressed a letter to Senator C. W. Jones touching this matter, in words as follows, to wit:

KEY WEST, FLORIDA, November 6, 1875.

DEAR SIR: Presuming upon your kind offers, I herewith inclose a map of the island of Key West, which, upon examination, will show you the cemetery laid down in red lines, my wife's portion of the same being 130 by 117 feet. The street which you will find running through said cemetery is only an imaginary street, it being owned by my wife Euphemia, there being a great many officers and soldiers buried on the same.

Some years ago I offered to sell to the Government five acres contiguous to said cemetery for the sum of $1,000, and a bill passed the House of Representatives (H. R. No. 4005) on the 19th of February, 1873, authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase the same for that sum. I am not now willing to sell at that price, but shall demand according to the rate which lands in the immediate vicinity have been selling; for instance, square 55, being about four hundred feet square, was divided, as shown by the map, and sold under execution at my instigation under foreclosure of mortgage, and brought $3,360. Thus you will perceive that lands must have rapidly increased in value since my said offer was made. The Government has also on another portion of my land erected privies, which are used by the troops, and which thus far I have been unable to have removed, although I have repeatedly requested it. You will therefore oblige me very much by giving this matter your attention, as eighteen or twenty years' occupancy by the Government is sufficient time to await their pleasure. My wishes in the matter are, first, immediate and unobstructed possession of my property. If that is refused upon the ground of military necessity, then that the value of such quantity of land as is desired be ascertained according to our State statute, (vide acts 1945, chapter 25, section 2, pamphliet 43), or I will agree to submit the value to arbitration, the United States choosing on rocate.

My father joins me in kind regards.

Your obedient servant,

W. C. MALONEY, JR.

Hon. CHARLES W. JONES, United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

December 18, 1872, General Hardie, inspector-general, made a report, of which the following is an extract, to wit:

[Extract from General Hardie's report, dated New Orleans, December 18, 1872.] A small piece of ground, outside the limits of the United States property at the barracks, appears to have been used during the war, though private property, for cemeterial purposes, it lying immediately outside the cemetery.

Adjacent is another parcel of land, private property, used for the men's sinks. The garrison limits cannot be contracted by the withdrawal of the bodies interred in the private property referred to, nor should the sinks be brought into the garrison limits. A plat, exhibited to the department commander and furnished the inspector-general at Washington with a copy of this report, exhibits the narrowness of the limits. The unhealthiness of the climate in the summer season forbids the propinquity of causes damaging to health.

Five acres of land, which can be bought at $200 per acre, will furnish ground to include the cemetery site and other necessary land; and it is recommended that an application be made by the department commander to the Secretary of War to have the necessary appropriation for the purpose applied for.

This was accommanded by the following letter of the Secretary of War January.

This was accompanied by the following letter of the Secretary of War, January

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 13, 1873.

The Secretary of War has the honor to submit to the House of Representatives, for its consideration, with a view to the necessary legislation to carry it into effect, an extract from a report of Inspector-General James A. Hardie, of an inspection of the post of Key West, Florida, in which he recommends the purchase of five acres of land for the enlargement of the post, which is now insufficient for the wants of the garrison.

WM. W. BELKNAP, Secretary of War.

February 3, 1874, the Secretary of War wrote a letter touching this land, as follows, to wit:

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 3, 1874.

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 3, 1874.

The Secretary of War has the honor to recommend to the House of Representatives legislation by Congress authorizing the purchase of a piece of land adjoining the military post at Key West, Florida, embracing within its area five aces, the same being contiguous to and south of the reservation, including therein the private property taken in the year 1862 for the enlargement of the said military post, in extent being three hundred feet deep and seven hundred and fourteen feet long, or thereabouts, said land claimed and owned by one William C. Maloney, and that a sum not to exceed $1,000 be appropriated to pay therefor.

In this connection attention is invited to letter from this Department, dated January 13, 1873, submitting to the House an extract from a report of Inspector-General James A. Hardie, of an inspection of the post of Key West, Florida, in which he recommended the purchase of the land referred to; also, to House bill 4005, third session Forty-second Congress, authorizing the purchase of the property, which passed the House February 19, 1873.

WM. W. BELKNAP,

WM. W. BELKNAP, Secretary of War.

January 26, 1876, the Secretary of War wrote the following letter, namely:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, D. C., January 26, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to forward to you a copy of a letter of Mr. W. C. Maloney, of Key West, Florida, addressed to you on the 6th November, 1875, relative to certain lands owned by his wife, and occupied by the United States for military certain lands owned by his wire, and occupied by the United States for initiary purposes.

Efforts have been made by this Department to obtain authority to purchase the land referred to by Mr. Maloney, as will be seen by the copies of letters herewith, addressed to the House of Representatives.

You will perceive by the papers herewith that a bill (H. R. 4005) passed the House at the third session of the Forty-second Congress, and was referred to the Military Committee in the Senate February 21, 1873, but, for want of time, probably, was never reported.

At the price now asked this land will cost about $4,620. It is, however, important for the Government to own this property, and I would recommend its purchase at the price named.

the price named.
Your co-operation is respectfully requested.
Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,

Hon. CHARLES W. JONES, United States Senate.

The map forwarded by Mr. Maloney, marked 415-1, War Department, 1876, is inclosed herewith.

The Government has for years been using a portion of this parcel of land for grave-yard and sinks. The owners are entitled either to the possession of this parcel held by the Government or to a reasonable price or value for the same.

Your committee therefore recommend the accompanying bill as a substitute, and recommend the passage of the same.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I very much question whether we had better buy any more land in Key West, Florida. The post for a very large part of the year is known to be a very unhealthy one, and it is not a very good place for a military post in any case. For a naval station it may be of some consequence at some time. But, however that may be, it appears to me that the proposition reported by the Senator from Missouri gives an authority to the Secretary of War such as we are not accustomed to give to any officer of the United States under any circumstances; that is, an unlimited authority to buy just as much land as he pleases of these people and at a price that he is willing to give. The provision as it stands is that he is to buy at a price agreed upon. The provision as it stands is that he is to buy at a price agreed upon, not to exceed a reasonable sum, of which he, of course, and the other parties must be the judge under this bill—"a certain parcel of land belonging to W. C. Maloney and wife"—without either describing the lands by metes or bounds or putting any limitation upon the quantity. I think we ought not to confer upon any executive officer of the Government any such authority in either of these respects; and I move to amend the amendment reported by the committee by striking out the words "a reasonable sum" and inserting "$2,000," which is double the price this gentleman offered to sell the land for a few years ago, and he says it has since been in the occupation of the Government. He says later, it is true, that the value of land has increased there; but, if he treats this as a former appropriation, I suppose the value of the rest of the land will have increased enough certainly if we give him double what he was willing to sell it for a few years ago. It seems to me it is all we ought to authorize to be given.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee.
Mr. COCKRELL. The reason the committee did not fix the price was that they were unwilling that the price which was recommended by the Secretary of War, amounting to $4,620, should be paid. We thought that was too much; but we were not able to fix what was a fair and reasonable price, and we presumed that, with all these facts before the Secretary of War, and these offers, he would not venture to give more than had been asked: $4,620. That was the reason we referred that discretion to him. In regard to the quantity, it was not supposed that the Secretary of War would undertake to purchase any more than had been under negotiation for a series of years, and which more than had been under negotiation for a series of years, and which would be reasonable and necessary for the use of the garrison. Then we reported an additional section, that, in the event they cannot agree upon the price, the Department shall surrender the possession. The committee were not wedded to the idea that the Government should purchase the land. They dig not really have anything before them but what they have reported to the Senate. They were not certain that it was a matter of necessity, and therefore they did not want to give a peremptory order to purchase, but wanted to leave it discretionary, and if the Secretary of War does not purchase they thought possession ought to be surrendered. So far as an individual member of the committee is concerned. I have no objection to the $2,000 being of the committee is concerned, I have no objection to the $2,000 being inserted

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should not have ventured to make these suggestions if it had not been for the circumstance, aside from the matter of principle, that I have seen this place myself within a couple ter of principle, that I have seen this place myself within a couple of years last past; and certainly if I owned the land I should be very glad to sell it for $400 an acre, or even $200 an acre. The island of Key West is not famous for the value of its land. It is a flat coral rock, with sea mud and sand washed on to it in some places, so that there is some earth on some parts of it. But this land lying alongside of the military reservation or post is low, where the tide almost overflows it; and whether it belongs to these people or is public property as a part of the sea-shore, of course we do not know. But that

Mr. COCKRELL. I will explain that this is in the rear of the military reservation; it is not next to the shore. The military reservation on the south is a straight line, and on the west is a straight line, and on the east follows the shore; and this is at the southwest corner of that reservation, entirely away from the sea-shore.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may not be right on the shore, but as I remember the points of the compass even in that location it would be between the reservation and the shore, although the reservation itself borders on the shore, and as the shore trends westward it would fall in it.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is a map with the papers which explains it.
Mr. EDMUNDS. Take that to be so, I will not detain the Senate on the question of which side of the reservation this land lies, for it would not change its value much in the chaparral that grows there. But what I wish to suggest is that, if we authorize the Secretary of War to give double what this gentleman asked for his property a very few years ago, we shall have contributed our share toward the rise of real estate in that region, for almost the sole value of real estate there is estate in that region, for almost the sole value of real estate there is the circumstance that it is a military and naval station, and if the military and naval operations of the United States were withdrawn from that island, as I think they ought to be—but I do not undertake to instruct the Chair, [Mr. ANTHONY,] who is on the Naval Committee, or my friend from Illinois, [Mr. Logan,] who is on the Military Committee, as to either of these propositions—the land would not be worth anything at all. There is a little manufacture of cigars, &c., carried on there which furnishes a little industry, and there are some wreckers there, but it is a very small village. So I think we should be doing a very liberal thing to this gentlemen if we doubled his price of doing a very liberal thing to this gentleman if we doubled his price of a few years ago instead of quadrupling it, as he wishes us to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Committee on

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.
Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to insert after the word "tract," in line 6, the words "not exceeding five acres," which will limit it to the quantity named.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to my friend from Missouri that in the seventh line, where this land is stated to belong to Maloney and wife, it would be better to say "claimed by," for, although there is a proviso that we shall not get it unless the title is found to be in them, it would be more harmonious to say "claimed by," and then the proviso would operate more correctly. I move to strike out "belonging to"

and insert "claimed by."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Missouri whether it may not be necessary for him to have some provision here making an appropriation of the money to pay the sum that may thus be agreed upon? There is no appropriation as the bill stands as amended.

Mr. COCKRELL. The reason that was not put in the bill was that we did not know that the Secretary of War would actually make the purchase. If the price shall not be agreed upon, the land is to be returned to whoever may be the owner of it, and if we made an appropriation it might not be needed for that reason. The money can be appropriated in a general appropriation bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suppose the appropriation can be made after the bargain is made; but the Senator will certainly see that if this contract should be concluded and the land obtained, there is no way the parties can get the money under this bill as it stands.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not want to provide for raising money unless I know that we shall need it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that all authorities of this kind—as we have put them into later bills about the purchases or sales of lands—ought to be exercised within a limited time by law, so that if the ought to be exercised within a limited time by law, so that it the thing should be forgotten now, ten years hence some fresh Secretary of War may not be stirred up to buy land that at that time we should not need at all. Therefore, I move to amend by adding at the end of the amended section we are having under consideration the words:

But this authority shall expire at the end of two years from the passage of this act.

Mr. COCKRELL. "One year" would do just as well.
Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well, "one year;" that is better.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves to amend the amendment in the manner which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the first section the amendment of the committee:

But this authority shall expire at the end of one year from the passage of this act.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to. Mr. EDMUNDS. In the second section the Secretary of War is directed, if he does not make the purchase, to cause the possession of the property, or such part of it as is occupied by the United States, to be restored "to the owners thereof." If Maloney and wife are not the owners, and there are some other owners who put in no claim, and who have abandoned any claim that they may have ever had, some old outstanding title, it would not be right probably to restore it to Mr. Maloney, and it would not be necessary to restore it to the owners unless they should come forward and make some claim. I think it would be well to make that direction to restore apply to Maloney and wife, and upon the condition that it turns out to belong to

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that amendment. The Senator from Florida, who is not now present, [Mr. Jones,] stated that there was no question about the ownership of Mr. Maloney; still if he is not the owner of it, the possession ought not to be restored to him, and it ought not to be restored to any owners unless they want it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know that there is any dispute about the title; but as a matter of precaution in legislating, I think we ought not to direct the Secretary of War to turn this property over to anybody unless it belongs to him; and in that the Senator from Missouri agrees.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is correct.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I therefore move to insert after the word "property," in line 7 of section 2, the words "if the same belongs to said Maloney and wife."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And to make it harmonious I move to strike out the three last words of that section, "the owners thereof," and insert the word "them."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I believe, in order to prevent trouble hereafter, I will offer this amendment, to come in after the last word of the first sec-

And that the necessary amount of money to pay for the said land in the event of purchase is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.
Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator from Vermont offered an amendment

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator from Vermont offered an amendment requiring that the property should be returned to Maloney and wife? Mr. EDMUNDS. If they own it.
Mr. JOHNSTON. I suggest to the Senator that the property ought to be returned to the person from whom it was taken, whether he had title or not. The Government ought not to take property from a man, whether he has title to it or not. The question of his title is for the

Mr. EDMUNDS. But as this bill is for Maloney and wife, and no-body else is complaining, I think, inasmuch as the Secretary of War would have authority without any act of Congress to restore land that he is wrongfully occupying and could be compelled to do so by suit at law, it would be scarcely necessary to make a general provision that he shall give it up to whomsoever it belongs; but, inasmuch as they are the only claimants, if it belongs to them it ought to be returned to them, and if it does not belong to them it ought not to be returned to anybody until some one comes forward to claim it, as it is not worth anything.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase a parcel of land on the island of Key West, Florida.

SIOUX RESERVATION.

Mr. ALLISON.. I ask unanimous consent to make a report. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 590) providing for an agreement with the Sioux Nation in regard to a portion of their reservation, and for other purposes, instruct me to report it with amendments; and I ask that the bill may be considered

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the amendments had better be printed, and let the bill go over until to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. There is a special assignment for to-morrow, made by unanimous consent. I ask to withdraw the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall ask that the bill go over when reported again just the same, in order to have the amendments printed.

Mr. ALLISON. I make the report then, and ask that the amendments proposed by the committee be printed. I should like to give notice to the Senator from Vermont and other Senators that I will ask an early day for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to its being considered, but inasmuch as it is an important bill I think it right that we should see what the amendments are and let the bill take the regular course of lying over and having the amendments printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should prefer that the amendments be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the order.

CHARLES E. HOVEY.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 575, for the relief of Charles E. Hovey. Mr. HITCHCOCK. The regular order on the Calendar is the bill preceding that. We are down on the Calendar to the bill immediately preceding the bill named by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have been out of the Senate part of the morning, and I noticed that bills were being taken up on motion. If the Senator has no objection, I should like to have this bill disposed of now. I have been requested to call it up by persons interested in it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no special objection to the bill, seeing that it is an unimportant one and will take but a moment; but we are on the call of the Calendar of unobjected cases, and this bill immediately follows the next bill in order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If the Senator objects, I withdraw the application.

DISTRICT INSURANCE LAW.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the Calendar will

The next bill on the Calendar was (S. No. 569) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of insurance companies in the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I object to the consideration of that bill. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill goes

SCHOOL LANDS IN NEBRASKA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 256) to confirm school-indemnity selections of public lands by the State of Nebraska.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will state in regard to that bill that a similar bill has already passed the House and been referred by the Senate to the Committee on Public Lands and by that committee referred to myself as a subcommittee. I had not intended to formally report the same until to-morrow, as I have just received the bill from the committee and have had no opportunity to compare the two.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The bill which passed the House is precisely the same as the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PADDOCK. So I understand, and I have been instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to substitute that bill for the Senate bill if, on examination, I found this to be so; but, as I said before, it has just been referred to me and I have had no opportunity to ex-

mr. HITCHCOCK. That is precisely the purpose for which I rose, to move to substitute the House bill. It is exactly in the same language as the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am ready to take up the House bill if my colleague thinks it best to do so, after the statement that he has made, and it is in order to do so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I move that the House bill No. 1962 be substituted for the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not understand that motion to be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The House bill is not before the Senate and not in possession of the Senate, but of the Committee on Public Lands, and it must be reported from that committee or the committee discharged from its further consideration before it can be considered by the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I will move that the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then I will move that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 1962, it being in precisely the same terms as the bill already reported from that committee.

Mr. PADDOCK. I had been instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report the House bill when satisfied that the Senate and the House bill are the same, and to recommend its passage. I had not had an opportunity to compare the two bills to see if they are exactly similar, but I am ready to take the statement of my colleague that they are, as he says he has done it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The bills are exactly the same.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do therefore now report that the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1962) to confirm certain school-indemnity selections of public lands by the State of Nebraska, have instructed me to report it without amendment, and recommend its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive the report,

if there be no objection.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs that the selections of school lands made by the State of Nebraska as indemnity for tracts in sections 16 and 36, otherwise disposed of, which are suspended in the General Land Office for the reason that they are for lands which, under the act of March 6, 1868, can only be disposed of under the homestead and pre-emption laws, and to which no other legal objection exists, shall be confirmed, and title be transferred to the State as in other cases of such selections

Mr. PADDOCK. When I reported from the committee Senate bill No. 256, I sent up in connection with the bill a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office recommending its passage and stating the reasons for it fully. I ask that the Secretary read that letter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can state in a word what I think will satisfy every Senator present as to the object of the bill. It is simply to correct a mistake in the act of 1868. By that act sections 16 and 36 in each township in the State are set apart for school purposes; and it is also provided that when those sections have been occupied by settlers who were on the lands prior to surveys, the State is authorized to select other lands contiguous in lieu of those sections so occupied. By the act of Congress at the time the Pacific railroad was located lands within twenty miles of that road were reserved from settlement. By the act of 1868, when these lands were reserved from settlement. By the act of 1868, when these lands were restored to market, the expression was "for pre-emption and homestead only," Congress evidently intending to make that distinction, but selling the lands at public sale, as in other portions of the country, at a certain time. Therefore the Commissioner of the General Land Office did not feel justified in confirming these selections until it shall be corrected in the manner that this bill proposes to correct it. Mr. SARGENT. There is no conflict in this case between settlers?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no conflict between settlers or any-body else. The bill is prepared in accordance with the wishes of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and there is no objection

Mr. PADDOCK. I renew my request that the letter of the Commissioner be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be reported.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE, Washington, D. C., February 8, 1876.

Department of the Interior, Grneral Land Office,

Washington, D. C., February 8, 1876.

Sir: In reference to Senate bill No. 256, entitled "A bill to confirm certain school indemnity selections of public lands by the State of Nebraska," which you filed in this Office for an expression of my views thereon, I have the honor to state that it appears that Nebraska, having the right to select school land under the acts of 20th May, 1826, and 26th February, 1859, (now sections 2275 and 2276 of the Revised Statutes,) as indemnity for lands in sections 16 and 36, granted for schools, but which were otherwise disposed of on account of pre-emption claims acquired prior to survey, or from other causes, selected certain lands as such indemnity, and on their being reported to this Office and examined here, the selections, to the amount of 31,611.86 acres, were found to embrace tracts lying within the alternate sections reserved to the United States in acts of Congress making land grants for reilroad purposes, and the price thereof fixed at $2.50 per acre, and which come under the operation of the act of Congress of March 6, 1868, providing that the lands therein referred to shall be subject only to entry under the pre-emption and homestead laws.

This Office holds that where, as in this case, the sections 16 and 36 appropriated for schools lie within the limits of railroad grants, and selections are to be made of indemnity for tracts lying therein which have been otherwise disposed of, this may be done from the alternate reserved sections, within the same limits, the price of which is fixed at $2.50 per acre, where there is no express provision of law to prevent it; but in the case of these selections, the prohibition contained in the act of March 6, 1868, of any other disposal of the lands than such as is provided for in the pre-emption and homestead laws stands in the way of the approval thereof; that prohibition extending to the even-numbered sections along the routes of the several roads mentioned in the act of July 1,

purposes," and the acts amendatory thereof. [See acts]
Apart from the prohibition referred to, there is no reason why the tracts called for in these selections should not be appropriated for the purpose of their selection which would not apply to any other tracts held at the double minimum price which might be selected. I think that this bill (S. No. 256) should be passed.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. K. LIPPINCOTT,

Acting Commissioner.

The bill was reported to the Senate Without attendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, Senate bill No. 256, which is a duplicate of the bill just passed, will be removed from the Calendar by indefinite postponement. The Chair hears no objection.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR BOUNTIES.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask leave to report a bill from the Committee on Military Affairs, with a view of having it taken up and considered now. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 525) to extend the time for filing claims for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866, which expired by limitation on January 30, 1875, until March 1, 1880, have directed me to report it without amendment. This bill is for the purpose of extending the time of application for bounties in the Second Auditor's Office. We passed a bill through the Senate the other day almost identical with this, the only difference being that the House bill extends the time this, the only difference being that the House bill extends the time six months longer than the Senate bill; but inasmuch as they have more difficulty in getting up bills in the House than we have here, one of the Representatives, who introduced this bill, asked me if I would not have it taken up in the Senate. The difference is so slight that I think it would be a proper thing for the Senate to pass this bill; and then I will ask that the Senate bill be postponed indefinitely, the only difference being, as I stated, six months' additional mr. SARGENT. Has the Senate bill passed the Senate?

Mr. LOGAN. It has passed the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for informa-

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I see there is a mistake in the print of the bill; "1880" is not the proper time. I did not see the inside of the bill; I only read the outside; and I now withdraw the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator suggest a correction ?

Mr. LOGAN. I will correct it by the papers, for I know it is a mistake. I will not ask the Senate to pass the bill now.

CHARLES E. HOVEY.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move to proceed to the next case on the Calendar, Senate bill No. 575.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill is regularly in order. The bill (S. No. 575) for the relief of Charles E. Hovey was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Charles E. Hovey, out of moneys collected by him under an alleged contract with the Secretary, dated January 6, 1873, such sum as, in the opinion of the Secretary, is sufficient to reimburse Hovey for expenses in of the Secretary, is sufficient to re-imburse Hovey for expenses inor the Section of the services information given and services performed, not to exceed the moiety of the moneys so collected.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The case is simply this: The Government had a claim against the Mobile and Ohio Railroad for duties on iron imported prior to the war; it had instituted suits, and had failed to recover on those suits, when this Charles E. Hovey went to the Secretary of the Treasury and informed him that he had information which he would give him which would enable the Government to recover the duties; whereupon the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Bourwell, under the joint resolution to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to collect wrecked and abandoned property, derelict claims and dues belonging to the United States, made a contract with Mr. Hovey that he should have a moiety of the sum recovered by the information which he should furnish. The suits were then proceeded with, and a compromise made by the Government with the railroad company, by which the Government received into the Treasury some $23,000. Mr. Hovey made claim for his moiety of that sum under the contract. The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury gave his opinion that he was clearly entitled to it. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Bristow having become Secretary, dissented from that opinion, and thought that the contract was not properly made under the joint resolution to which I have referred for the recovery of derelict claims. The Comwhich I have referred for the recovery of derelict claims. The Committee on Finance, to whom this matter was referred, had some difference of opinion as to whether this contract did strictly and literally come within that resolution or not; but it was very clear that the Secretary of the Treasury had made the contract with Mr. Hovey, and that the Government had received some $22,000 or $23,000 by means of his services. This bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized in his discretion to pay Mr. Hovey such sum as will compensate him for the expenses he has incurred, the information he compensate him for the expenses he has incurred, the information he has given, and the services he has rendered, not exceeding in any event one-half of the sum recovered. There is a printed report setting out all the facts which can be read, if Senators desire to hear it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question. Ought not the expenses to come out of this moiety under the contract if the Secretary of the Treasury should deem that this man is entitled to the moiety?

is entitled to the moiety?

Mr. BAYARD. That is provided for, I think.
Mr. LOGAN. That is part of the bill.
The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAJOR FOSTER A. HIXON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 333) for the re-The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 353) for the relief of Major Foster A. Hixon, late a paymaster in the Army; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the claim of Major Foster A. Hixon, late a paymaster in the Army of the United States, to be credited in the settlement of his accounts with the sum of $10,000, which he claims was stolen from him at Charleston, South Carolina, on the 1st of March, 1867, and all claims for credits and differences in his accounts as such paymaster be referred to the Count of Claims ferred to the Court of Claims.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out the following words, beginning in line 8 amendment to strike out the following words, beginning in line 8:

And all claims for credits and differences in his accounts as such paymastershall be, and hereby are, referred to the Court of Claims, with jurisdiction to hear and determine the same. And if the said Court of Claims shall be satisfied from the evidence that he suffered the said loss, and that it is equitable and just the said amount should be allowed to him, it shall make a decree to that effect, upon which the proper accounting officer of the Treasury shall allow him the amount so decreed as a credit in the settlement of his accounts: Provided, That the testimony of said Hixon shall be received in his own behalf by said court, and that an appeal shall be allowed to either party as in other cases.

And in lieu thereof insert:

Shall be, and hereby is, referred to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, with directions to examine the same; and if they shall be satisfied from the evidence presented that he suffered such loss without any negligence on his part, and that it is equitable and just the said amount should be allowed to him, they shall allow him the amount as a credit in the settlement of his accounts.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire if the committee themselves are fully satisfied that there was a loss without any fault on the part of this officer?

Mr. MITCHELL. I made the report, and I am convinced from the testimony in the case fully.

Mr. SARGENT. It is not a doubtful case?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; I would not have consented to report the bill favorably if it had been.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. ELIZA T. POTTER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 384) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza Potter, widow of Lorenzo T. Potter, deceased, late of Charleston, South Carolina; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and in-

That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,000 to Mrs. Eliza Potter, widow of Lorenzo T. Potter, deceased, late of Charleston, South Carolina.

Mr. WITHERS. Let us hear the report read or have some statement from the Senator who reported the bill.

Mr. BOGY. We should have some information in regard to it.
Mr. LOGAN. I can state substantially the facts as the report gives Mr. LOGAN. I can state substantially the facts as the report gives them. There are a great many papers and much evidence connected with the case. The case came up in 1859, and the Senate passed a bill giving this lady $20,000, just as the committee reported it. It is the same bill precisely, word for word. It went to the House of Representatives and on account of the want of time the bill did not pass that House. Again it was reported to the Senate and for want of time it was not taken up. The facts are that this lady resided in Charleston, South Carolina, with her husband during the war. They were considered according to the testimony people of some wealth. were considered, according to the testimony, people of some wealth. She used, as the proof both of confederate officers and Union officers and soldiers on both sides shows, for charitable purposes, $40,000 of her money. Since that time her husband has died and she is left in destitute circumstances, her property being destroyed. She lost some two or three hundred bales of cotton; but that of course is not a matter in consideration. She lost all of her property; and in view of the expenditures made during the war for charitable purposes, the Senate, in 1869, concluded to make her a gratuity of this amount of money as they had done for the Sisters of Charity in Charleston for the same purpose. That is the fact.

The statement I have made is fully borne out by reliable testimony on both sides showing these facts. We have reported the same amount that the Senate formerly thought ought to be allowed, and on the

Mr. SARGENT. Was that amount paid at that time?
Mr. SARGENT. But not the House of Representatives?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; the amount was not paid. That is all there is in this case.

The amendment was agreed to.
The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MINERAL LANDS IN MISSOURI AND KANSAS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1251) to exclude the State of Missouri from the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining with an amendment, to strike out the word "State," in the third line, and insert "States;" and after "Missouri," in the same line, to insert "and Kansas;" so as to make it read:

That within the States of Missouri and Kansas deposits of coal, iron, lead, or other mineral be, and they are hereby, excluded from the operation of the act entitled "An act to promote the development of mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I rise for the purpose of making some inquiries. Of course it is impossible for us to understand from the mere reading of this bill its object, and I therefore propose to ask the Senator from California to explain the object of the bill. It is impossible to from California to explain the object of the bill. It is impossible to understand it from its language.

Mr. SARGENT. The act of 1872 relates to the States and Territories containing precious metals, gold and silver, and recognizes what are called mining customs, a species of common law that grew up among miners for years before Congress or the courts took any notice of the business of mining. The law of 1872 was aptly designed to enable miners to acquire titles to their lands on paying the value which the United States set upon those lands into the public Treasury. These customs were recognized for the nurses of showing hours. These customs were recognized for the purpose of showing bona fide occupation and the extent of the possession at a given time, the time of the passage of the law; after that the amount being regulated by the statute.

Mr. WRIGHT. Where there were precious metals?

Mr. SARGENT. Mines of precious metals; but the wording of the law was sufficient to take in coal lands and mineral lands containing non-precious metals. The States of Missouri and Kansas, in which non-precious metals. The States of Missouri and Kansas, in which no such customs exist, and in which many of the features of the law are inapplicable, find that the law as extended over them prevents them from acquiring ordinary mineral lands; that is to say, coal lands, and prefer, as has been explained to the committee, to be remitted to the laws that existed before the act of 1872. To that the Mining Committee have no objection whatever, and this bill merely excludes them from the provisions of this act of 1872.

Mr. H AMLIN. The Senator can also state, I think that in every instance where the attention of the committee has been called to it, other States have already been excluded in precisely the same way.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator is correct so far as the Senate is concerned. This same bill, applying to both Missouri and Kansas, passed the Senate at the last session. A similar bill was passed by the House of Representatives, but there was a difference in the wordthe House of Representatives, but there was a difference in the wording of the acts; they did not exactly coincide. I believe it might be stated more accurately by saying that the bill passed the House and came to the Senate, and on the suggestion of the Missouri Senators it was amended in some slight particulars. It went back to the House, and they failed for want of time to act on the Senate amendment; but the Senate and House have both acceded to the policy of this bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. And I think I am right in my recollection in saying that anterior to that time a bill certainly passed which met the requisition of your own State, Mr. President, in relation to mineral resources.

Mr. SARGENT. That is quite possible; I do not now remember it.

Mr. HAMLIN. And that became a law, based upon the same principle with this bill. I was not present at the meeting of the committee when this bill was agreed upon; I could not be, as I was attending upon another committee; and although it did not receive my support there, I believe it is eminently right.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am to understand then, of course, that the Committee on Mines and Mining, after a careful examination of this subject, are unanimously of the opinion that it is proper and right that ject, are unanimously of the opinion that it is proper and right that these States should be excluded from the act of 1872, and that that is the whole object and purpose of this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator is correct in his view.

Mr. WRIGHT. Therefore I understand that the general law touching all other mineral lands where there are not precious metals is made to apply to these States, they being exempted from the act of

Mr. SARGENT. That is the purpose of the bill. Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand the Senator from California to say that the mining law of 1872 applies to all coal lands unless spe-

Mr. SARGENT. I say that the act of 1872 is so drawn in the first section of it, as the Senator will observe, that it may possibly be applied to coal lands. At any rate they find some embarrassment in these States in the application of the law, and therefore ask to be relieved from it in regard to mineral lands containing non-precious metals.

Mr. ALLISON. I made that inquiry with a view of suggesting that my own State, the State of Iowa, be included in this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection at all to including Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that it is necessary to make such an amendment, and will not press it now.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended so as to read: A bill to exclude the States of Missouri and Kansas from the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill was reported adversely, and will be passed over.

Mr. WRIGHT. The report in that case was made by the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES,] and a motion to reconsider was entered. Unless there be some special consideration, I know no reason why that matter should not be disposed of rather than have it remain on the Calendar.

Mr. WITHERS. The motion to reconsider was made by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON.]

The PRESIDENT protempore. The pending motion is to reconsider the vote indefinitely postponing the bill.
Mr. COCKRELL. I object to the present consideration of the bill. I see the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] is not in his seat, and he is interested in the matter.

Mr. WRIGHT. I shall not insist upon its disposal. I supposed the Senators interested in the bill were present.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not like to make objection to any particular bill; and the reason is obvious to everybody; but I am not at all sure that it is not my duty to make an objection to any bill whatever before it is presented; and the Chair looking about the Senate, or rather about the Senate Chamber, will anticipate what I mean. There are a great many seats here, sometimes occupied by members of this There are very few here occupied in that way now; and if we are to consider bills which are of any importance, unless they are very clearly right, I think it might be proper to take some measure to have the attendance of a larger portion of the Senate than is here

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from New York that the matter to which I called attention was a private bill which had been indefinitely postponed and a motion to reconsider entered. The Chair remarked that the bill would be passed over and not be taken up in

Mr. CONKLING. Was this an adverse report?

Mr. WRIGHT. It was reported adversely.

Mr. CONKLING. I sympathize heartily with the Senator about that particular bill, without knowing what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to considering the question of reconsideration, it goes over.

EDWIN FAIRFAX GRAY.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next case on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 23) for the relief of Edwin Fairfax Gray; which was reported adversely on the 1st instant from the Committee on Claims and postponed indefinitely; and on the 10th instant the vote to postpone indefinitely was reconsidered and the bill placed on the Calendar.

I do not like to take action in his absence. do not like to take action in his absence. I suppose he is desirous of having it disposed of.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Does that imply that all the bills shall be taken up and referred?

The SPEAKER. They can be, if no objection be made.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But suppose objection be made to the reference of one bill. On yesterday a bill in relation to the admission of New Mexico into the Union was objected to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not able to see the good policy of refusing to refer a majority of the bills on the Speaker's table because one or two may be objected to. The Chair, however, makes no objection to asking that all the bills on the Speaker's table have appropriate references this morning.

JOHN E. KELLEY.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and hereby is, authorized and required to pay to John E. Kelley the regular compensation as messenger for forty-nine days' service, rendered from December 23, 1875, to February 9, 1876, inclusive, notwithstanding his failure to take the prescribed oath before entering upon the discharge of his duty as such messenger.

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ELKINS. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration and adoption at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.
The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to this House, with its accompanying map, the report of Lieutenant Ruffner, of a survey made under the direction of the War Department for a military wagon-road from Fort Garland, Colorado, to Fort Wingate, New Mexico.

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

TIMBER LANDS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WALLING, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 1191) to regulate the survey and sale of the timber lands of the United States, and moved that the bill be printed with the amendments and recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

Further, the Committee for the District of Columbia have a subcommittee on judicial questions, and I think this resolution should properly go to that committee. I can assure the gentleman that it shall be well, fairly, and fully considered, and an early report made. made.

Mr. WALLING. With that understanding I have no objection to that reference. The language of the resolution will have to be changed accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The change will be made.

The preamble and resolution as modified were referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the Senate amendments to House bill No. 810, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and to move that the amendments of the Senate be printed and that the House non-concur in the same. Upon that motion I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman include in his motion a request for a committee of free conference on the disagreeing votes of

MRS. REBECCA S. HARRISON.

Mr. HARTRIDGE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H R. No. 2683) to regulate the pension of Mrs. Rebecca S. Harrison; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SUBSIDIES FOR RAILROADS, ETC.

Mr. LAPHAM, by unanimous consent, presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, relative to the granting of subsidies by Congress in aid of the Texas Pacific Railroad and other internal improvements; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed in the Precent

The resolution is as follows:

Concurrent resolution relative to the granting of subsidies by Congress in aid of the Texas Pacific Railroad, and other internal improvements.

Concurrent resolution relative to the granting of subsidies by Congress in aid of the Texas Pacific Rallroad, and other internal improvements.

Whereas it appears that applications for the aid of the National Government in the form of money, credit, bonds, or indorsements of the bonds of private corporations are now pending in the Congress of the United States to an amount exceeding $600,0.000 for the purpose of promoting schemes of canals, railroads, or other internal improvements, the value and utility of which are at least doubtful, and which are not demanded for present commercial, military, or national reasons; and whereas it also appears that important committees of the said Congress are now seriously considering the propriety of recommending the appropriate legislation whereby the United States will be committed to a guarantee or indorsement of the interest payments upon the bonds or promissory obligations of certain railroad corporations, amounting, in the aggregate, to about $230,000.000 in gold, for the purpose of constructing a railroad line from Northeastern Texas to the Pacific Ocean, near the thirty-second parallel of latitude, with numerous branches thereof, amounting to over three thousand miles; and that this encouragement given to this class of proposals tends constantly to swell the number and extent of such applications, and is giving rise to many schemes of like questionable character, which have failed to secure the approval of private capitalists, and which, by their combined influence and support, embarrass, retard, and interfere with the proper subjects of legislation: Therefore,

Be it resolved, (if the assembly concur.) That it is unwise, impolitic, and dangerous at this time of depressed trade and heavy financial burdens for Congress to embark the country upon such gigantic works, and thereby invite other and further demands for national assistance to the detriment of the people and good government; and that our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use all proper

LOSSES BY INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

Mr. THROCKMORTON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish for the information of the House of Representatives the number of claims for losses through Indian depredations filed or presented in his Department since the date of the report of Acting Secretary B. R. Cowen, January 9, 1875, with names of the claimants, the amount of each claim, the date and locality of the depredation, and the tribe or band of Indians committing the same.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I desire to state that the Committee on Appropriations propose to devote the whole of to-day to general debate; and after to-day, if the committee is sustained by the House, general debate will be closed, and the further consideration of the bill proceeded with by paragraphs under the five-minute rule.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Turney in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes Mr. BLOUNT. I yie

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield to my colleague, [Mr. FELTON.]
Mr. FELTON. Mr. Chairman, retrenchment and economy in the public expenditures is the declared policy of this House. The country in its financial embarrassment demanded this much at our hands. They confided in our promise of reform. With a democratic House of Representatives a reduction of official patronage, of public indebtedness, and of attending taxation must necessarily ensue. realization of these hopes is guaranteed by what this House has already accomplished in this direction. We are moving steadily along the "whole line," reducing the expenditures of the Government to the lowest point consistent with the good faith and efficiency of the Government, creating no office for favorites, continuing no man in place if his services can be dispensed with, making no appropriation of money unless essential to the happiness and prosperity of the country, and bringing the salaries of officials to a level in some measure equal to and compatible with the straitened circumstances of those whom we represent and serve.

Just now there is much said and written upon financial questions. Just now there is much said and written upon financial questions. Every man has his theory of finance. Inflationists, contractionists, resumptionists, are everywhere and in all political parties. Every financial nostrum is put forward by its inventor and licensed vendor as a specific for all the financial ills the country is heir to. I submit, the solution of these difficulties in part is to be found in curtailing expenses, economizing in every possible way, and husbanding the internal and custom revenues of the country.

There are certain great commercial and industrial laws above and outside of legislative enactments, beyond our control. Sometimes outside of legislative enactments, beyond our control. Sometimes these laws may be modified, diverted for a time from their natural functions, disturbed and disarranged by unwise tinkering and impolitic intermeddling; just, for example, as the motion of some great celestial body under fixed law may be disturbed temporarily by some inferior satellite, or just as the magnetic needle when in the neighborhood of large metallic deposits may be disturbed, its variations uncertain, its trembling movements unreliable. But all these disturbing influences are temporary and local, and the great primary law of their organization soon asserts its authority and supremacy. great laws of commerce, of productive industry, and the hundred departments of human activity and enterprise may be disturbed and disarranged for a time by bad laws. But if these great principles are not weighted and pressed down by accumulating debts, they will adjust themselves to every exigency of the country.

It is amusing to hear some men discourse upon the ease and practicability of resuming specie payments at any given time. It is the act of sovereignty, they say, and only requires the edict of the soverign to accomplish the desired object. I have read the story of Canute, who was carried by his courtiers into the path of the rising tide and was told by these flatterers that it only required a wave of the royal hand and a word from royal lips to send back that irresistible torrent and to establish his claim to supreme authority. You remember that the wise and virtuous monarch sent those courtiers home wiser if not better men. Equally absurd, in my judgment, is it for Congress or the Executive or for boards of trade to fix the day or the year when the country shall commence specie payments; forgetting, as they do, that the laws regulating trade and commerce and production, and specie and currency are beyond and superior to their sovereign will; forgetting also that this country is weighted and pressed down with a load of taxation and debt that renders it well-nigh helpless. We must remove or greatly lighten these weights, ease this pressure of

I know that heretofore in times of suspension, both in this country and in England, resumption has been reached by previously fixing the day; but legislators in these several cases, like the Delphian oracle, took good care before giving an answer or fixing anything defi-nitely to acquaint themselves with surroundings and learn that the proposed project was possible; yet in every one of these instances of forced resumption incalculable loss and financial distress was the result. Legislators simply demonstrated their capacity to crush out all productive industry and commercial thrift by crushing out the self-regulating principles which underlie all production and commerce

I will not speak at this time of excise laws; how odious they are to the people of this country. Excise is taken from the Latin excidere, to cut off. It is a term used in finance to signify a duty charged in a country upon articles produced in that country before they are permitted to get into the hands of the public. These laws were introduced into Rome by Augustus. There they led to abuses innumerable, and gave rise to many civil dissensions. Tiberius declared that the army, for whose benefit the tax had been levied, depended upon it for support, and this was the only way by which he reconciled the reconciled ties continuance. people to its continuance.

This excise system was first introduced into England in 1626 by a This excise system was first introduced into England in 1020 by a commission under the greal seal. Its first introduction into our civilization was therefore an act of tyranny. Parliament protested against it and it was canceled. This tax was re-established in England by parliamentary act, 1643, both of the contending parties availing themselves of its benefits, but pledging themselves to its abolition as soon as the war should close. Cromwell, by acts unauthorized by law, continued it in existence, and a portion of this internal revenue was assigned to the Crown in compensation for hereditary revenues arising from feudal prerogatives which were then abolished. So then to-day this system of taxation stands out in our civilization as a modern supplement to ancient feudalism.

The very name is objectionable to American freemen. It was this hatred to excise and stamp duties which gave birth to American liberty; and the spirit of Boston in 1776, which now pervades the whole land, can never be reconciled to it. It is true the Government during the administration of Washington inaugurated a limited system of excise duties; but even that gave rise to insurrections and civil disturbances, and upon the accession of Jefferson to the Presidency and upon his recommendation the whole system of internal taxes was abolished. May I not assert that whenever this Government shall become as pure, as economical, as wise as it was in the days of Jefferson, this anti-American system of taxation will again disappear? the war, and perhaps was needful for a few years after the war, because everything, labor, capital, production, all, must and of right should be made tributary to the credit of the American Government. Every species of property and industry is pledged to the redemption in good faith of every promise and obligation of the Government incurred in the war for the restoration of the Union.

But I assert if the retrepulment in public expanditures which this

But I assert, if the retrenchment in public expenditures which this House proposes to effect had been inaugurated six or eight years ago, and had been adhered to by the dominant party, this vexatious system of taxation might to-day cease, and the revenue arising from customs duties levied upon importation of foreign merchandise would meet every demand of an honest and wise government. Let us see what this tax has done for the manufactories, the occupations, and the agricultural production of the country. It has gathered from all these since 1863, when it was put in action, $2,086,590,703.88. Admitting its necessity during the war and perhaps up to 1870, this excise has collected from the labor and production of American citizens since 1870 $789,264,865.87. It was made necessary by the war and the results of the war until 1870. Since that period it has been made necessary by the extravagance and culpable expenditures of the Government.

What has it done for my own State, a State desolated by war? in ruins, needing all the products of her labor for recuperation and self-sustentation. From Georgia it has gathered since 1866, when it became operative in that State, $19,668,419.03. From 1863 and 1866 it has reaped from-

Virginia	$45, 097, 215 80
West Virginia	7, 722, 908 55
North Carolina	13, 184, 970 50
South Carolina	7, 060, 054 39
Alabama
Mississippi
Louisiana	31, 746, 917 00
Texas
Tennessee	19, 194, 825 00

Making a grand total collected from the States especially devastated by war, since their national rehabilitation, of $157,249,645.60. This is a direct tax upon their labor and the great agricultural staples of that section. The increased amount paid by Virginia shows what tobacco is doing toward the support of the Government, and shows that agriculture must be drained of its hard earnings while many investments of the capitalist are exempt from every form of taxation. I feel that there is not only hardship, but injustice here. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue says in his report, after giving the net amount of receipts from all sources of internal revenue during the last amount of receipts from all sources of internal revenue during the last fiscal year in the several States and Territories:

The results thus shown do not indicate that the States paying the largest amounts of internal revenue pay in proportion to their relative population or wealth.

This is the injustice connected with this whole system, particularly with that portion of the revenue extracted from tobacco States. All excise duties are strictly direct taxes, levied upon or cut off, excidere, from the industries of the country; and the Commissioner says the States paying the largest amount do not pay in proportion to their relative population or wealth.

The Constitution says, article 1, section 2:

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States * * according to their respective numbers.

Here in this report it is boldly announced that the wealth of the country does not sustain the burdens of the country.

Referring once more to the Southern States and the $157,000,000 Referring once more to the Southern States and the $157,000,000 that has been gathered from them—principally from their agricultural productions—since 1863, permit me to remark that I have seen penury casting in its two mites, well-nigh all its living, to sustain some cause which lay near its heart; but here we have States prostrated by war, the accumulations of a century swept from existence, States mourning like Rachel because their "children were not," widowhood and orphanage filling the land with their tears and a struggle for bread going on among all classes of society; yet in the midst of their bitter poverty and desolation they pay into the Trefsury of the United States within ten years, as a direct tax upon their labor and production, this immense sum of money, and for all this their patriotism is sometimes impeached, their professions of loyalty are sometimes criticised, and impeached, their professions of loyalty are sometimes criticised, and upon their reception into the Union of States the entente cordiale of a common brotherhood is sometimes denied them.

But, sir, I favor consolidation of districts and retrenchment of expenditures in the revenue department of Georgia for reasons specially applicable to my State. Economy in public expenditures, removal of supernumerary officials, and an equitable adjustment of taxation are the great demands of the country just now. In Georgia the Internal Revenue Department of the Government, with its association and collusion with the Department of Justice, (so called,) offers the most promising field for retrenchment and reform that I know of in all the complex machinery for carrying on the Government.

The aggregate receipts from each collection district in Georgia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, were:

First district Second district Third district Fourth district	63, 643 88, 362 181, 109	12 85 22
Total	388, 226	84

Now let me ascertain the expense of collecting this amount of revenue. I submit a letter from Hon. D. D. Pratt, Commissioner:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE INTERNAL REVENUE, Washington, February 23, 1876.

Sir: In compliance with request contained in your letter of 22d instant, I have the honor to hand you herewith the amount allowed for each collector and deputy collector in the State of Georgia for the fiscal year 1875:

First district of Georgia :
Personal salary of collector, per annum.  Three deputies, $1,500 each One deputy.	4 50	00	00
Second district of Georgia:
Personal salary of collector, per annum  Four deputies, $1,500 each One deputy. One deputy, four months Third district of Georgia:	6,00	00	00
Personal salary of collector per annum One deputy Three deputies, $1,500 each	1,80	00	00
One special deputy	1,50	JU	UU

Fourth district of Georgia:
Personal salary of collector, per annum	3,000 00 7,500 00 1 <sub>7</sub> 800 00 600 00
Respectfully,

Hon. W. H. FELTON, House of Representatives.

The total amount of these items of expense is $45,300. Permit me to ask the attention of the House to one feature in this list of expenditures.

The amount of revenue collected in the first district was $55,111.65. The expense, as given in this letter from the Commissioner, was $10,300. The amount collected in the fourth district was $181,109.22. The expense, as given by the same authority, was $12,900.

While the amount of revenue in the fourth district is more than three times the amount collected in the first district, yet the expense in the fourth is only a fraction more than it was in the first district.

Here we have an unanswerable argument for the equalization of these expenditures.

The expense should bear some proportion to the amount of work done, and these districts should not be continued for mere partisan purposes, as sinecures for favorites, Government asylums for its political pensioners.

If one collector with a salary of $3,000, a limited number of deputies judiciously located in the State, and two clerks—if they can do the work which is now done by this large number of employés, let us have consolidation and retrenchment in the revenue department of Georgia. But, sir, the expense I have mentioned is only a small part, a fraction of the cost of this department in my State. So far everything seems legal. Fixed salaries, regular work. This corps of officials are not responsible for the extravagance of the Government in the number of its appointees or the amount of money paid them. The Congress of the United States is accountable for such permitted extravagance.

agance. But there is another Department of the Government, a sort of adjunct or auxiliary of this revenue department. The two are so blended in my State that it is difficult to disentangle their interlacing threads. You can only trace the one through the other, as you trace the blackish, fetid drainage of some great city through the clearer waters of some stream into which the sewer empties. This other department is called—hear it, ye gods!—"the Department of Justice."

There is such a "reign of terror" exercised over the upper counties of the State which I in part represent upon this floor that I feel constrained to make some effort for the removal or explanation or modification this terrories are to describe the state which I in the second strained to make some effort for the removal or explanation or modification this terrories are the second strained to make some effort for the removal or explanation or modification this terrories are second strained.

ification of this terrorism perpetrated under the guise of law.

That there are violations and intentional infractions of the revenue laws is not denied. That these violations should be prosecuted and punished is not controverted, but rather insisted upon.

The people of my State are faithful and loyal adherents to every

the United States, and there is no State in the Union where the citizens and the State authorities will exert themselves more zealously in executing the laws of the Federal Government than Georgia.

Our people recognize this whole country as their common country, the home of their children. If, in the future, emergencies should arise imperiling the honor or glory of its flag, that flag will find no stronger arms nor braver hearts coming to its defense than will be found in the military contributions of the empire State of the South. The courage and endurance that illustrated her sons upon a hundred bettle fields of civil strife are now and forever at the disposal of the battle-fields of civil strife are now and forever at the disposal of the General Government.

One other remark. The counties in my State that are suffering most at this time from the maladministration of the revenue laws are the counties where the citizens generally are making the greatest efforts to abolish in their midst all the evils resulting from the traffic and intemperate use of alcoholic liquors.

In Gilmer County I am told, under the local-option law that is in force in our State, the people have succeeded in abolishing the retail traffic in the county.

In some counties in my district where these outrages are perpetrated I know that the young men are banded together in temperance organizations, and have well-nigh swept the manufacture of liquor

State suffering most from these revenue difficulties.

I mention these facts to show that the people who are crying out against these oppressions are no apologists for "illicit distillation," no advocates for "crooked whisky," or abettors of a smuggled liquor

Indeed, the farmer, who grows his small crop of tobacco is frequently arrested, sometimes subjected to innumerable indignities, and only finds escape possible by complying with the illegal demands made upon him.

I can speak from personal knowledge, and say that county jails are frequently crowded with men who have been arrested and brought there seventy-five or a hundred miles from their homes; away from their witnesses, away from their friends, away from commissioners who should investigate their cases by other county jails. Hundreds of these men are thus incarcerated, humiliated, bullied, and fleeced, who are as innocent of crime as you, sir, or any other man on this

Now, you will remember, these deputy marshals and commissioners receive fees, perquisites; and it is no surprise, when you remember they charge up mileage against the Government for themselves and their prisoners, to learn that they sometimes travel a hundred miles when the same work could be done by traveling fifty miles; and the mileage of an innocent man counts as well as the mileage of a guilty mileage of an innocent man counts as well as the mileage of a guilty man; the fees for conducting the preliminary investigation of an innocent victim count as though he was guilty.

It appears during the last fiscal year out of the cases before the Federal court for violating the revenue laws in Georgia there were one hundred and one suits decided in favor of the United States, and eighty-four suits decided adversely to the United States, and twentynine suits dismissed, showing conclusively that a majority of the arrests are innocent men, or without evidence sufficient to convict them. You and I will never know how many of these arrested parties not reported in this class were discharged and dismissed by commissioners and marshals before reaching the court in Atlanta. I see ties not reported in this class were discharged and dismissed by commissioners and marshals before reaching the court in Atlanta. I see also, on July 1, 1875, there were one hundred and fifty-three suits pending, and it is reasonable to suppose that among these pending cases there are as many innocent parties as there were in the suits disposed of. Indeed more, for this system of terrorism and fleecing is growing more clamorous for victims from day to day. I wish I had the reports for the present fiscal year.

Now, I see an item in the report of the Attorney-General that throws a great deal of light upon the irregularities of which I speak. In statement of expenditures made by the Department of Justice to defray the expenses of the courts of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1875, for the district of Georgia, are the following items of expenditures:

r marshals	$78, 700	00
Attorneys	6, 105	00
Clerks
Commissions
Rents	1,500	00
Miscellaneous	309	00
Total	95, 337	80

Think of this, Mr. Cnairman. Out of $95,337.80, $78,700 is paid to these deputy marshals and their chief, who are spreading terror, sorror, and death through the upper counties of Georgia. Should we be surprised that innocent men are arrested?

This tells the story of men being handcuffed and pushed at the point of the bayonet a hundred miles distant from home to undergo a preliminary trial. Mileage fees, perquisites, all charged up against the Government, amounting to $78,700, all under excuse of enforcing the revenue laws. the revenue laws

In the United States the marshals cost $2,393,681.78. But all this is a trifle compared with the violence and bloodshed of which they are guilty in my State.

Let me give you some of their proceedings. These vigilant deputies, after stuffing their pockets full of warrants, (and I wish the testimony I have as to the character of those warrants was official so I might use it; but it is not, and I pass it over,) place themselves at the head of a squad of Federal soldiers, say a dozen or more, and thus they proceed to counties distant from railroads, and with no law but a ruffian's greed, backed by shot and bayonets, they enforce their

I will ask the Clerk to read, as part of my remarks, extracts from two newspapers, published one in Gilmer County and one in Cherokee County, Georgia.
The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Ellijay Courier, January 16, 1876.] CONCERNING RECENT ARRESTS.

ELIJAY, GEORGIA, January 16, 1876.

EDITOR COURIER: On Friday night, the 14th instant, I was on my way home in the upper portion of this county, from where I had been making boards that day. I had my crosscut-saw with me. I came by the still-house of Mr. John Emory. Near there I met with some boys—Sison, Rogers, and Leatherwood The night was dark and cold. We went into the still-house to warm by the fire and to wait awhile for the moon to rise. While sittling there some men entered the door and ordered us to surrender. We made no resistance. In a few moments we heard a gun fire just out of doors. We heard no one halted, nor no word spoken by any one out doors. Just after this a soldier entered the house, and one who was guarding us said: "Grady, was that you fired?" He answered, "Yes." The guard replied, "That's right, pour it to them." Then Grady stepped out doors and was absent a few moments. The sergeant in charge then bursted up all the beer-stands, destroyed the still and other articles, and broke up a wash-pot in the yard, handrifed my self and the three boys with me, and carried us up to John Emory's dwelling. They then entered the house, found a keg of brandy, filled their canteens, found some jugs and filled them, then bursted the keg and poured out the contents on the floor. The lady, Emory's wife, cried and plead with them not to do so. I demanded of them if they had any warrant against me or either of the others. They gave me no satisfaction. They cuffed us together, two and two, and then carried us up into Fannin County. The night was very cold, and we were made to wade water-courses on our way; our clothes were frozen upon us. We were retained as prisoners till we were brought down below Ellijay, when Leatherwood and myself were released, the second night after our arrest. We never heard a word of Emory's murder until we came back from Fannin County, the day after the murder. Then we heard that John Emory had been killed at the still-house, and the gun whe heard in my opinion, was the gun that kil protection during the war under the Union flag, and my son served in the Union Army. And I now ask, in the name of God, of liberty, justice, and everything that is sacred, if these things are to be tolerated in this country? Is the great Government of the United States to back the bloody and vindictive Blacker and his vile crew of criminals that he has selected in this country to aid him in his hellish work, under the pretense of enforcing the revenue laws, in this the glorious centennial ways of the crickers.

when I was arrested I demanded their authority for my arrest; told them I had a family of small orphan children alone at home, with no mother with them, and plead with them with tears in my eyes for my release, that I might go to my children; but it was all in vain. Such is liberty now, it seems.

OUTRAGES OF REVENUE SCOUTS.

Reports reach us from reliable sources that the revenue agents continue their unwarrantable and tyrannical conduct in the upper part of this county. At a late hour on the night of the 26th ultimo, one of these agents entered the house of Michael Cline, and, brandishing his cocked revolvers, so badly frightened Mrs. Cline, who was in a critical condition, that her recovery is doubtful.

Last Wednesday night an old out-house occupied by the notorious Cook women was burned, and one of the women thereupon went to Cartersville and reported a number of citizens living in the neighborhood as being either Kn-Klux or illicit distillers. The result was that on Thursday night some revenue officials, aided by a squad of Federal soldiers, went to the domicile of the parties reported, arrested eight citizens, some of whom are above suspicion, and carried them off. One of the prisoners was Mrs. James McCoy. They broke into her husband's house late in the night, captured him and her, and forced her to march on foot to the old Burrows place, and there, almost without shelter or fire, she was kept until late Friday morning. Mrs. McCoy was in the poorest condition that a wife could be to endure harsh treatment.

The truth of these reports is vouched for by several credible witnesses. The facts would induce one to think he was reading of some high-handed outrage perpetrated in a Turkish province, were he not informed that they occurred in republican America. How long is such tyramy to last? Government is a sham, democratic institutions are a failure, if such shameful proceedings are permitted to Men having the commission of deputy marshals, a civil office, halt men at dead hours of the night, and if they refuse to obey shoot them down as outlaws. Helpless and delicate women are arrested and so exposed as to endanger life. The entire section of the State is disturbed and trembling with apprehension, not knowing where the blow will fall or when their money will be exacted.

As the Representative of this people I protest against the unrightense continuance of these outrages.

ous continuance of these outrages.

eous continuance of these outrages.

Mr. Chairman, now for the remedy.

First. This bill suggests one remedy, consolidation and retrenchment.

My observation teaches me that one effectual way to suppress wrongand pamper men at the expense of the Government whose services can be dispensed with.

Second. Require every man arrested for violating the revenue laws to have his preliminary trial in the county in which the offense is alleged to have been committed. Stop this despotic work of drag-

Third. Take these Federal troops and put them at some employment worthy of an American soldier; and, if the President cannot find marshals with sufficient respectability to induce citizens to assist them in making these arrests, then ask the governors of the States to order out a posse comitatus of citizens, and my word for it all these revenue troubles will cease in Georgia.

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. ATKINS Mr. Chairman, the most notable event which has Mr. ATKINS Mr. Chairman, the most notable event which has marked the material progress of our country within the last twelve months was the railway convention in the city of Saint Louis in November last. Thirty-one States and Territories were assembled, through their duly-accredited representatives, charged with the patriotic duty of considering and devising the best mode of constructing another transcontinental railroad to the Pacific coast.

From the high character of these representative men, their acknowledged ability, and the long public service of many of them in the business, commercial, and professional walks of life, the entire public felt guaranteed in the most sanguine expectations of the result of their labors. They were delegates assembled from every quarter and section of the broad Union, without fee or compensation, intent upon the evolution of a single thought. That grand idea found expression in the unanimous demand of that convention upon the Congress of the United States for an open highway for all time to come for the Government and the people of this whole country from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. Accomplished, and it would stand to-day as the most important event of modern times.

What is the proposition? The bill which I had the honor to introduce provides that the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, already richly endowed by splendid land grants, both by the State of Texas and by the United States, amounting to many millions of acres, in consideration of a guarantee by the Government of the United States of 5 per cent. interest on the company's construction bonds, the interest not to exceed $1,750 per mile—thereby assuring the sale of the bonds in European markets at par, and thus cheapening the cost of the whole road—gives to the Government a first mortgage upon the entire road, equipments, and net earnings, the proceeds of the sale of the lands, and also as additional security authorizes the retention by the Government of amounts due the company for Army and postal transportation and telegraphic facilities, and provides that the Government may further hold in the Treasury of the United States $5,000 per mile of the bonds of the company while the road is being built.

Was ever security made stronger or more certain? Not only does the Government retain a lien on the property created by a loan of its credit and upon the lands heretofore granted several years since, but, in addition, becomes the mortgagee of the donation from Fort Worth to El Paso, which the munificence of the great State of Texas has bestowed upon the company.

What further security is given to the Government for this mere extension of credit? I answer, the absolute remission to the Government of 33,000,000 of acres of land which is now granted to the Atlantic and Pacific Company, and which, by the enactment of this bill into a law, reverts to the United States for the benefit of actual set-Is the reversion to the Government of such a large quantity of land nothing? Why, sir, it is worth at least $50,000,000; more than half the entire amount of bonds were the Government required to pay every dollar of it. Add the 33,000,000 acres of land which the bill returns to the Government to the 9,000,000 of acres unencumbered, donated by the State of Texas, computed at $3 per acre, a low price for that rich and prolific soil, beneath a more than Italian sky, together with the grant in the Territories of 10,000,000 of acres, and we have at the outset a present and unfailing security against the loss of a dollar upon the part of the United States. The whole amount of bonds to be issued for the entire road would not exceed $90,000,000, and, at 5 per cent., the amount of annual interest, if every bond were issued, would not exceed $4,350,000. But as the bonds are only to be issued as the road is built in sections, the last bond will only be issued as the last section is contracted for. Besides the bill provides that there shall be no accumulation of interest, because, whenever the company shall fail to pay the annual coupons of interest, the Government at once has the right to sell the property of the company and the road itself. Hence the Government would not, could not, be involved for only six months' interest before it would have the right to sell, and indemnify itself. And as the bonds are only issued as the road is constructed no large amount of bonds would at any time be upon the market.

I invoke especial attention to this point and challenge refutation. Observe, in order that the Government shall be certainly protected, the company is required to pay the interest every April and October; that is, every six months. Now suppose that the company shall build as much as one hundred miles in six months, which is, perhaps, a large estimate, and should fail to provide for the interest, amounting to $87,500, when due, it is the privilege of the Government to foreclose the mortgage and sell enough of the property of the company at once to re-imburse itself for any payment it may have made. Of course no further issue of bonds can be made by the company until it shall recover its franchises by paying back to the Government the installment of interest it had advanced. Hence, in no event can the Government be bound for the interest on bonds except for a limited distance of the road, until the whole road is completed. the road is built through to the Pacific, no one pretends, with its connections all perfect and commanding the vast resources of trade which naturally belong to this line, but that its dividends will be ample to meet accruing interest and create a sinking fund sufficient to extinguish the bonds. The dividends of the Union Pacific and Central acific are more than sufficient for these uses on their debt.

With the vast increase of population and the improvements and developments of the age, it is safe to infer that the lands themselves would be worth five if not ten times that sum as soon as the road is finished. But the security does not stop here. The construction of this great highway between the Father of Waters and the Pacific Ocean upon the thirty-second parallel of latitude, thus avoiding snow summits on the one hand and malarial districts on the other, passing through a country unparalleled for the richness of its soil and the value as well as variety of its productions, by which the commerce of the States of the Atlantic slope and the interior is exchanged for the tropical wealth of the regions toward the setting sun, must and does afford the amplest guarantee of adequate profits upon the whole line over the gross earnings. And this net dividend belongs to the Government and enters into the collaterals in addition to those stated at the beginning of my remarks, which the United States holds as independent and the collaterals in addition to those stated at the beginning of my remarks, which the United States holds as indemnity against possible loss.

By reference to the last annual report of the Central Pacific Company and the Southern Pacific, and which are to some extent owned by the same individuals, it will be found that their net incomes for several years have been largely in excess of the interest asked to be guaranteed by this bill. The net earnings of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad Companies are shown by this report for 1875, even upon their 2,250 miles of finished railway, to have been $6,729 per mile. The gross earnings for 1875 were $15,433,179.01. Deducting interest on their bonds loaned them by the United States of about $4,000,000, and about $11,500,000 is the remainder. The companies have issued of first-mortgage bonds about the same amount that was loaned them, say $65,000,000, and deducting same for inter-est on this sum, and the handsome profit of about $3,500,000, foots up that year's operations. There is every reason to believe that the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company would surpass these results as soon as this road is completed. Even upon the finished road upon which no guarantee of interest is asked in this bill, between Shreveport and Fort Worth, a distance of about 400 miles, with terminal points of no mentionable importance, the net income of that unfinished part of the road has been about equal to the interest sum in question. How, then, can this indorsement of the interest on the bonds-not of the bonds themselves let it be distinctly borne in mind-be fairly con-

I think I have shown by comparison with actual facts and figures that the net profits upon the road would more than meet the annually accruing interest. This calculation did not claim any advantages over the other transcontinental line by reason of the great difference in the cost of construction per mile, the Central Pacific costing over $107,000 per mile, while the Texas and Pacific will cost less than $40,000. Nor was the superiority of the line upon the thirty-second parallel of latitude insisted upon as the more likely to declare large dividends by reason of less capital being expended in construction and on account of its superior advantages as to the natural wealth of the country through which it passes as compared with the other lines. might fairly be pointed to, for there is not beneath the sun such a country as much of that through which this road will run, if we consider all the elements of wealth and fruitfulness which the bounty of nature has lavished upon this favored land, and which, when this road shall penetrate it and carry to it teeming thousands of hardy emi-grants of pluck and enterprise, intent upon securing from the grasp-ing hand of remorseless capital a home for their struggling families, will rise as by magic under the guidance of honest industry and skill from the haunt of the wild beast and the brutal savage into organized communities and States, where the benign influences of religion and law will be substituted for the scalping-knife and tomahawk. Even the State of Texa alone, with her boundless undeveloped resources, and the hidden wealth of the mines of Arizona, New Mexico, and the adjacent states of Mexico, would afford a never-failing supply of transportation and traffic which would insure the healthy revenues of the enterprise. The increase of wealth and of population in Texas since the war is simply marvelous. Her great staple of cotton and her boundless resources of live stock, not to speak of her valuable mines of coal and minerals, the rich treasures which lie half concealed beneath her floral bosom, constitute the basis of a commerce which alone would make the whole road a financial success. The resources of this route are truly wonderful both in their extent and variety.

This great interoceanic thoroughfare would bring us directly into communication with the republic of Mexico with her 9,000,000 of population, embracing an area of 862,460 square miles, a district as large as the whole of the States east of the Mississippi River, and equal in extent to several first-class countries in Europe combined. The fierce partisan and political revolutions which have for more than a century swept over that unhappy and badly-governed people have operated as a perpetual drawback upon the development of the unparalleled natural resources which distinguish that country from any other of equal proportions on the face of the earth. Although within the last quarter of a century there has been a marked improvement in the habits of industry among the population and Mexican commerce has assumed a place among the tabulated reports of trade, still, from a variety of causes, it is very far below the standard of what even is expected of a semi-civilized race. But as it is, the United States, which is her nearest geographical neighbor, has but little trade with that nation. England, by her wide-awake diplomacy, has managed to monopolize the bulk of Mexican commerce

The United States import nearly $100,000,000 of sugar and molasses annually, two-thirds of which is brought from Cuba, and is manufactured at exorbitant prices, on account of the war which has now raged for seven years in a form which shocks the moral sense of Christendom.

Our importation of coffee, tropical fruits, leather, tin, rubber, cigars, and varieties of ornamental wood, such as logwood, rose, mahogany, ebony, and other kinds; all of which articles are manufactured or grown in Mexico, besides many others not named, would afford the basis of a profitable trade with that country. But Mexico, in her mineral resources, whether for the richness or extent of her mines, is the wonder of the civilized world. Humboldt, shortly after the beginning of this century, said that Mexico up to that time had yielded over six billions of gold and silver. Her export product of silver amounts now to $25,000,000 annually. And yet this land, teeming with more than oriental wealth, lying in a day's travel from the Mississippi River, is sending her exports thousands of miles across the ocean and bringing her imports in return, and thus cultivating the most amicable relations with European and other countries, while the United States, for the want of a railway from the Mississippi River to her borders, are losing nearly all of this valuable trade, but which with proper efforts upon our part might be made to quadruple itself in a single decade.

Nor is that the worst feature of the situation. The remoteness of these neighboring shores from their respective central governments, the facilities for brigandage, to which an almost imaginary boundary offers scarcely an obstruction, affording opportunities and inducements to robbery and murder, the recent and too frequent occurrences of which even now render the danger imminent of embroiling the two republics in war, demand that this road be constructed so that no such painful imminency would exist. Mexico has lately under her present ruler shown great liberality in the facilities extended to her own and foreign companies to construct railways within her borders. So much so, it is safe to predict that, by the time the locomotive can pass from the Mississippi River to San Diego, Mexico will be connected with this great line by means of several roads now projected and partly under way, thus linking the two countries in one commercial embrace. So that, instead of spending millions of dollars to protect our borders from forays of Mexican banditti, and perhaps war with that people, these unhappy and bloody results may be entirely averted by a wise, prudent, and economical foresight upon the part of American statesmanship; and, in the stead of devastated fields, sacked cities, and a ruined commerce for our neighbor, we may be the instrument of enabling her to permanently establish her weak and tottering political structure upon a sure foundation—may stimulate her people in all the industrial arts, develop her vast resources, agricultural and mineral, and at last, after centuries of unsuccessful struggles, where the hero of to-day becomes the victim of to-morrow, advance her name upon the roll of enlightened and well-established governments, under a free constitution.

satesistat satisfies, where the hero of to-tay becomes the victim of to-morrow, advance her name upon the roll of enlightened and well-established governments, under a free constitution.

With such a newly-developed country at our doors, who shall calculate the inestimable value of a commerce so rich, varied, and exhaustless? This commerce would especially pay tribute to this road, and can any one for a moment doubt the abundant revenue it would afford?

But neither Mexican commerce nor the Territories through which this road will pass, and which will be touched into renewed life as if by the spear of Ithuriel, and made to pour forth of their bountiful resources, but the empires of China and Japan, Australia, and the isles of the sea are waiting to infuse the rich currents of their trade and commerce through this main artery, which connects with numerous veins along the whole length and thereby enriches and vitalizes the entire systems.

The measureless wealth of the traffic of these ancient empires has enriched every nation that has ever enjoyed it. And as this route presents fewer obstacles, lower grades, less climatic extremes, (being below the snow-line and above the malarial belt,) and shorter distances from ocean to ocean, with harbors at its oceanic termini of the largest capacity, in which navies might ride, it thus holds out every inducement to invite the friendly visit of that vast and varied commerce.

est capacity, in which navies might ride, it thus holds out every inducement to invite the friendly visit of that vast and varied commerce. This route, then, once established as the transcontinental link in the great international circuit or highway of commerce between the Orient and Occident, who so bold, with all the other advantages, but barely alluded to, which it possesses, as to deny or challenge its success; yea, the complete success of a great enterprise, which shall forever stand as a monument of physical science and commercial greatness?

But it is said that as the Government has been made liable for a heavy indebtedness on account of the aid given to the transcontinental line north of us, so in this case it will be involved. The cases are not analogous. Those companies built their roads at double what they ought to have cost, and they secured from Congress a loan of $65,000,000 of United States bonds, on which the Government is to pay the interest until their maturity without the company paying back a dollar, except the net profits of the company should it amount to over 10 per cent.; any surplus over 10 per cent. net profit the company is to refund. But since the road was built at double the cost it should have been, of course 10 per cent. upon the real cost would be 20 per cent. upon what it should have cost, hence it is clear that the company will pay nothing to the Government until the maturity of their bonds, which had thirty years to run from their issue.

But this bill requires that commissioners appointed by the President of the United States shall inspect the road as it is built, and that the bonds of the company thus indepted shall not be issued to the

But this bill requires that commissioners appointed by the President of the United States shall inspect the road as it is built, and that the bonds of the company thus indorsed shall not be issued to the company only as the money is needed to pay for work actually done, thus securing a faithful administration of the bonds of the company by having the earnings of the road to meet the interest upon the bonds issued for work done. Thus it is clear that no large sums of interest will accrue without the corresponding means of meeting it through the earnings and profits of the road which is constructed pari passu as the bonds issue. It must be admitted that this bill guards every point and provides every precaution against abuse of power or imbeliity of administration.

Unlike the Central Pacific, Union Pacific, and Southern Pacific, which are believed to be under one management, and, whether they are or not, act as a close corporation, this company does not ask for the loan of the bonds of the Government. Unlike them, too, Congress holds forever the right to regulate freight and fares and to keep the road as an open highway for the Government and the people. Unlike them, this company can never become a monopoly.

Sir, I assert here to-day that these other roads, forming one combination, with the extraordinary chartered privileges of prescribing their own tariff of rates and tolls, and with the obligation resting upon the Government to even pay over $3,000,000 annually for them in the way of interest besides being bound for the principal at maturity, which is $65,000,000, does constitute the grandest subsidized monopoly upon this continent. Moreover the only mode left to relieve the Government and the people of the grinding exactions of this overgrown power, which casts its shadow over the interests of the people and is eating up their substance and amassing in their own vaults, as they themselves have boasted, enormous profits and dividends, is to pass this bill and enable this company to construct this great road under the restrictions of power therein contained for the benefit of the people and their commerce, limiting the toll rates to a basis of a just balance between capital and production, not driving the one out of profitable employment, nor yet repressing unjustly and injudiciously the energies of the other.

By building this road the Government and the people forever secure a through road from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean, entirely under the control of Congress as to its rates of fares and freights. It will afford the only successful competitor to that graspnig monopoly which now dominates States and is independent of the United States, and forces the Government to pay its debts—a monopoly which well-nigh confiscates the produce of the people by its exorbitant tolls, and which dares to obtrude itself into these Halls to dictate to the representatives of the people what they should do or decline todo, that that monopoly may be protected and perpetuated. The bill particularly guards against allowing this company ever to form any combination with any transcontinental line of railway now in existence or which may hereafter be constructed in arranging a table of freights and fares; but, on the contrary, Congress expressly reserves the right to supervise and control the tariff of rates and forever to keep the road as an open highway, with which all other companies may prorate upon equal terms, thus securing the people in all time to come against a monopoly.

The counter-proposition to this bill comes from a company that

The counter-proposition to this bill comes from a company that owns a monopoly built by the money drawn from the Treasury of the United States, the people's money. If they have money to invest in another transcontinental line, why do they not pay the interest on their bonds instead of annually drawing from the Treasury of the United States about $3,000,000 for that purpose? And does any one suppose that a corporation which now enjoys an uninterrupted monopoly would in good faith construct this line of railway upon the thirty-second parallel of latitude upon the terms proposed in this bill with the exception of the indorsement, the effect of which would inevitably be to erect a powerful and successful rival to the road which they now own at such tremendous cost. Individuals might be guilty of such folly, but far-seeing, selfish corporations, never! No; this is only another illustration of the Greeks bearing gifts. If that corporation were to build the road as they propose under their bill now before Congress, it would only be an extension of their already unbridled monopoly, the very thing this measure is intended to counteract and defeat.

Not centent with the $65,000,000 of United States bonds and the payment of the annual interest for them, and an empire of land donated to them besides, this grasping company coolly demands of Congress to take away the grant of land made in 1871 to the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company, in which they have a vested right, and give it to them, and thus enable that company to control the only gateways to the Pacific coast. Like the daughters of the horse-leech, they continually cry, "Give, give!"

If this powerful railroad combination is permitted to monopolize the

If this powerful railroad combination is permitted to monopolize the only communication to the Pacific, whether upon one line or two, it will not be long until its great wealth and power will enable it to own and control the lines of ocean travel from the Pacific Coast to China, thus practically subjecting the commerce of the world to the exactions of its own rapacity. The highest duty this Government owes to commerce, to the people of this Union, and to itself is, to see to it that no such exclusive monopoly shall ever be allowed to lay its iron grasp upon the best interests of mankind.

This company would have us believe that it is imbred with the

This company would have us believe that it is imbued with the pride of American nationality. Let us see. It is charged, upon the authority of witnesses believed to be entirely reliable, sufficiently so to authorize an investigation to be instituted by resolution of this House, that this company has effected an alliance or contract with an English oceanic steamship company, by which all American commerce under the control of this railroad company is to be carried exclusively upon English bottoms, thus practically driving American merchantmen from the high seas. Give them the exclusive transcontinental routes which they are asking for, with their oceanic connections and foreign alliances acting as one corporation for all practical purposes, and truly they have dominated the commerce of the world to their own selfish designs. Accede to their extraordinary demands now pending in Congress and they will grasp the seepter of universal commercial empire.

I have no war to make upon these enterprises or any other which have for their object the building up and development of this great country, no matter where or in what portion of the Union they may be located. Such are justly entitled to reap reasonable dividends upon their investments; and where competition is allowed, it rarely happens that exorbitant profits are realized. But in this instance no competition exists. And now, when the Eastern, Southern, and Middle States seek to secure an open highway for their commerce between the oceans, what do we find? This Hall is besieged by lobbyists and interested officers and directors and stockholders of this huge railroad ring, using every endeavor to defeat this measure, and thereby secure for themselves in perpetua one of the most merciless monopolies of this or any other age or clime. Will Representatives listen to their siren voices?

With their pockets crammed full of Government bonds and proceeds of millions of acres of public lands, and with unheard of profits by doubling their rates since Congress refused further aid to the Pacific Steamship Company, the two combining for that purpose, in order to make up for the aid thus cut off, amounting in eight months to several millions of dollars' increase, they come here and have the to several millions of dollars' increase, they come here and have the unblushing temerity, with an assumption of saintly virtue, to inveigh and remonstrate against subsidies. Covered, shingled all over with Government bonds, and interest, and lands, and unusual charter-privileges, and yet virtuously crying "subsidy;" thinking that political war cry will alarm the representatives of the supposed State-rights school of members and force them into opposition.

What is a subsidy? It is a gift. Does Congress give anything by this bill to the Texas and Pacific Company? Not a dollar. If ever the Government should be called upon to pay a dollar, it is abundantly secured against loss in the future. But no business man can or will say, with the facts before him, with the vast resources and connections upon which this company relies and to which I have already referred, that one dollar will ever fall upon the Government.

already referred, that one dollar will ever fall upon the Government.

Then it is no subsidy that is asked by this company.

But who has asked and received a subsidy? Who now annually receives the aid of the Government as regularly as the one-armed soldier receives his pension? Who but this unpatriotic and selfish corporation who are here hanging around these lobbies to defeat this great measure for the relief of the people, this open road for the commerce of this country and of the civilized world, this great highway of nations, whose low freights and cheap fares make it the successful competitor of their darling monopoly? They talk about Congress squandering the public lands upon these companies, with 25,302,400 acres of land donated to the Union Pacific and Central Pacific, besides what has been given to the Southern Pacific Company. They protest, in the name of the public credit, against the Government affording the loan of its name to the company even to guarantee only the interest on the bonds of the company, and talk about building railways out of the funds of the Treasury itself. And yet these two companies have in their strong boxes $65,092,192 of Government bonds. What disinterested patriotism! Obtaining their charter at a time when the exigencies of the Government were imperious, the utmost stretch of power was given them; and, not content with that, they now force the Government, upon the technicalities of the law, through the courts to pay their interest, although they publish to the world that their profits of the last year were over $6,000,000.

I am not here to appeal in behalf of this road on the ground that it am not here to appeal in behalf of this road on the ground that it is a southern enterprise purely. True it is a southern enterprise; it is more. It is a national undertaking. The whole Union needs this road. There is necessity for the road South, and there is also necessity for this road North. The rapidly-increasing commerce of the whole Atlantic slope from New York to New Orleans needs this free outlet. And I am gratified that this bill will find warm supporters when this floor from every quarter of this broad lead. Why hat? upon this floor from every quarter of this broad land. Why not? It is not sectional or partisan. The most extreme opponents of the bill, I am sorry to say, are to be found in that district of the Union which was most scorched by the flames of the late war, and which lie nearest to the eastern terminus. Coming from a region sadly in need of some recuperating measure, I feel somewhat astonished, for I had hoped that we of the South could all agree upon one idea, and that is the necessity of rehabilitation and the mode of accomplishing it; but it seems that in that fond idea I am mistaken.

The southern Representatives, as a class—I am not speaking of those sometimes styled upon the floor as ex-confederates, for I recognize no such distinction and acknowledge no such disability as is confessed in the admission, for we are either peers or we are interlopers-have ever manifested an indisposition in urging forward those measures of internal improvement and material advancement which the northern and eastern, and indeed the western members have claimed and secured for their sections. We have stood by a construction of the Constitution the practical effect of which has been to enrich the North and impoverish the South. I am for the Constitution. I have sworn to support it, and, so help me, I intend to do so squarely. I am for the Constitution and the Union; and I am for this bill, for it accords with the Constitution and it will strengthen the Union.

But what I desire to say is, the southern members have attended to sentimental politics, while the northern members have looked after practical matters. See the difference. But a decade or so ago, and places upon which populous cities now stand were then in the wilderness. Territories have become States; railroads have been built and cities founded; and the flood-tides of immigration have inundated those regions of the far Northwest; while the Southern States, resurvessed for their climate and soil advantal to the production of unsurpassed for their climate and soil, adapted to the production of the cereals, cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar, and tropical fruits, have lagged supinely behind in the great race of improvement. It is true that we have borne the burden of the war and the still worse burden of bad government in many of the States since the war, while the representative people were laboring under political disabilities; but it must be confessed that, independent of these drawbacks, we have not pressed our wants and urged our claims to a fair share of the favors of the Government to which we are justly and constitutions. favors of the Government, to which we are justly and constitutionally entitled. I am aware that a very few gentlemen upon this floor who are strict constructionists will not perhaps indorse this sentiment.

There is high authority in the democratic party North and South to be cited in behalf of this principle of aid to internal improvements.

Such great and respected names as Cass and Douglas are committed to the policy. Admit that these land grants were originally wrong, it is too late now to undo what has been done. But this bill does not propose the voting away of a single acre, but rather to give back 33,000,000 of acres to the control and possession of the Government, as before remarked. Shall gentlemen stand here with any show of grace and consistency and obstinately oppose the poor boon asked for, in which the Government, as has been established, will not, cannot, lose a dollar, when that boon will prove a blessing not only to the South, but will diffuse a healthy influence all over the country by employing labor and enabling the people of the South and Southwest to purchase abor and enabling the people of the South and Southwest to purchase of our northern, eastern, and western fellow-citizens their wares, manufactures, and supplies. I repeat that they stand here and oppose this measure and at the same time represent upon this floor the wealth which this policy that they denounce helped to create in their own congressional districts. How much of the $1,751,271 which Congress has voted to roads and canals in Indiana was invested in the district of my friend Mr. Holman? And how much of the $647,354 donated to his State for public works did his district get? And was his district benefited by the aid given by the Government to the Portland Canal? I believe the gentleman both advocated and voted for that measure.

I have a table taken from a report of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Senate, January 7, 1874, showing what amounts of money each State and Territory has received from the General Government from 1789 to 1873 for railroads, canals, and wagon roads, and also for public works from 1865 to 1873:

With this record, Mr. Chairman, staring gentlemen in the face, I most respectfully submit, is it fair play? Is it generous? Nay, sir, is it just that these neglected portions of the Union should be refused the aid asked for? Ay, more, should be even heard with impatience, and treated as though they had no claims or rights which the majority should respect. Even in the prostrate condition of the Southern States, with their political relations kept disturbed by partisan agitators for the unholy and unpatriotic purpose of personal and party aggrandizement; with the labor system disorganized, and public con-States groaning beneath the grievous load of taxation and debt inherited from the war and the reconstruction policy; the figures show that these States annually furnish at least half of the export trade of this country, which goes to pay foreign interest and other indebtedness, and otherwise adjust the balance of trade between this country

Here, sir, is the large sum of $104,705,163.43 that Congress has appropriated from 1789 down to 1873 for railroads, canals, and wagonroads, of which sum the States of West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee, twelvein number, have received $20.46 Set 56, while the other States have received $101.458,501.57. ana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee, twelve in number, nave received $3,246,861.56, while the other States have received $101,458,501.87. These States contain $12,499 square miles, while the other twenty-six States contain 1,075,854 square miles only. Of this pittance West Virginia gets not a dollar; Texas not a dollar; Georgia, one of the original thirteen, gets not a dollar; South Carolina, another one of the old thirteen, gets only $9,961.92; Tennessee received only $5,000, and would not have got that but for the brave volunteers who followed the flag of the Union borne by her illustrious Jackson through the forests and swamps of the southwest to drive back the savages and to aid in conquering a peace with the haughty Britons upon the victorious plains of New Orleans.

Virginia, the cradle of the Revolution, the mother of the statesmen and heroes whom American patriotism will forever delight to honor; and heroes whom American patriotism will forever delight to honor; who in the prodigality of her generosity consecrated to freedom an empire, has received of this meager sum $57,538.27. And now, when the voice of Old Virginia is heard upon this floor pleading her own and the cause of her neglected sisters, it is stifled in the cry of subsidy that hoarsely murmurs through this Hall. Do I hear it from any of her own Representatives? I trust not.

The average politician never looks beyond the territorial periphery of his immediate district, and therefore when a proposition comes forward that does not locally affect his immediate constituency we generally find him arrayed in rather estantations, opposition; but I generally find him arrayed in rather ostentatious opposition; but I hope there are none such among us.

I am here to advocate a great measure of relief to the whole American people—a national measure—which is broad enough to embrace the national welfare. It is not in the interest of any company or set of men I speak. I care not the toss of a copper for the personal agencies that are employed to do this great work. I dare say this company has a record as yet untarnished; certainly I so believe; if there are corrupt influences on either side of this issue, all I have there are corrupt influences on either side of this issue, all I have to say is that I scorn the men so engaged, and hold them in unutterable contempt. I support this measure because it is in the interest of the people and of the freedom of commerce. I support it because it is right. There is an omnipotence in the right. In the name of justice, of the equalization of favors granted by this Government to the different geographical sections of this Union—for, as I said in a speech in this House over two years ago, "There are now, happily, no longer any political sections"—in the name of national consistency and generosity, in the name of the right, which neither man nor nations dare disregard I appeal to this House in behalf of my neglected. tions dare disregard, I appeal to this House in behalf of my neglected and impoverished people.

Gentlemen of the North, the bounty of this Government, gathering its revenues from the South as well as the North, has adorned your cities with splendid architectural monuments, erected your colleges and benevolent institutions, improved your rivers, dug your canals, deep-ened your harbors, and constructed your network of railways, by which towns and cities have risen like magic. You represent that immense wealth and population. By means of this bounty, you feel a glow of pride at your advanced civilization, which the Government nourished and protected; and now, when there is nothing more for Government to do for your States and we of the South ask for tardy Government to do for your States and we of the South ask for tardy justice, we are met by some with the cry of subsidy. Some of you forget the bounteous hand of Government that lifted you out of the vale of poverty and the depth of the wilderness. After being the recipients of governmental favor, and having grown from territorial sucklings to great and powerful States, you all at once conclude that the principle of subsidy, as you call it, is wrong. 'Twas right when you asked and received it, but ah! circumstances alter cases. Should the South sels it it is wrong.

the South ask it, it is wrong.

Now, it would be an interesting chapter of the political history of this country to present to the public in which the position of the leading men of all parties in Congress, democratic, whig, American, and republican, is shown, in favor of the principle of governmental aid to internal improvements.

Take the case of the grant to the State of Indiana in aid of the Wabash and Eric Canal. This act granted to the State of Indiana 1,439,272 acres; it passed in 1827. Such well-known democrats as Thomas H. Benton, John H. Eaton, Richard M. Johnson, William Rufus King, Horatio Seymour, and others voted for the bill.

Again, in 1830. Take the grant of 2,595,053 acres in aid of the Illinois Central Railroad. The bill was introduced by Stephen A. Dougnois Central Railroad. The bill was introduced by Stephen A. Douglas and reported from the Committee on Public Lands by General Shields, both democratic Senators from the State of Illinois. It was supported by such democratic Senators as Atchison, Benton, Bright, Cass, Douglas, Houston, King, Shields, and others. In the House it was voted for by such democrats as Bissell, Thomas L. Harris, John A. M'Clernand, William A. Richardson, John L. Robinson, Frederick Stanton, and many others.

I recur to this vote to show that leading democrats from the Northern States voted for these land subsidies; and while the bill I advocate does not ask an acre of land or a dollar in money, but simply a loan of Government credit for the payment of interest upon the amplest and most indisputable security, it is to be slaughtered by the cry of subsidy and by political anathemas of democrats chiefly from Indiana, Illinois, and California, all having been largely endowed with lead creater.

If this aid was wrong and unconstitutional, it is not too late to remdy the evil. It is perfectly competent to make restitution, and, in fact, the duty of those States to do so; if they have been made the favored recipients of this unconstitutional and unjust appropriation of the common treasure belonging to all of the States and people alike, without the warrant of the Constitution, will any gentleman give me a good reason why restitution should not be made? I can conceive in morals or religion no purer or better test of sincere reformation than a willingness to restore that which has been unjustly obtained. Now, if it is unconstitutional for Congress to aid this Texas and Pacific company, then it was wrong and unconstitutional for it to aid the very many northern enterprises which have had the fos-tering protection and bounty of the Government.

But I take it that no one will for a moment think of restitution.

Then let me beseech gentlemen to be just and consistent, and to quit talking about the Constitution, when its invocation is a mere pretext. Even some of our southern friends are very much agitated over the apprehension that the Constitution is about to be violated. I would maintain it in its integrity.

But let us examine the ground upon which southern members stand. They are viewing the Constitution from the old stand-point of the ante bellum era, the age peculiarly distinguished for the dogmas of State rights, the school of literal and strict construction. Well, we have seen how that school ended and broader and more liberal views Under that liberal view a majority of all parties have committed themselves to the policy which is asked in this bill. True some members from the South have stood back, and with hands uplifted have seen hundreds of millions voted away, nearly all going to the Northern States. But now when the precedent has been set, and the Constitution as expounded by the Supreme Court grants the power, the Congress time and again recognizing it and acting upon it, and the people accepting it and thereby ratifying the principle; and when the southern people, stricken as if by a paralysis of their commercial and financial affairs and languishing under the blight of their poverty and ruined fortune, seek this as a means of rehabilitation, shall their own Representatives gravely tell them it is unconstitutional?

In perusing the Annals of the Fifteenth Congress, I find that Henry St. George Tucker, a historic and distinguished name in Virginia, as chairman of a committee appointed to take into consideration the message of President Monroe in reference to roads and canals, submitted a report indorsing strongly the power of Congress "to lay out, improve, and construct post-roads through the several States military assent of the States;" also, to open, construct, and improve with the roads through the several States "with the assent of the States;" and also asserted the power of Congress to authorize the cutting of canals through the States with their assent and to make military roads.

Such is a part of the record of the early days of the Republic. It has been accepted as a precedent and followed in numerous instances, supported by the leading men of all parties.
On the 4th of February, 1817, Mr. Calhoun advocated in the House of Representatives the constitutional power of Congress to appropriate the dividends and bonds of the United States Bank for the purpose of building roads and canals. Again, in 1835, he advocated aid by the General Government to a road from Cincinnati to Chattaand by the General Government to a road from Chemman to Chattanooga; and in 1849 he was understood to favor the principle of Government aid to the Pacific Railroad on the southern route.

But, to go still further back in our political annals, we find that as early as 1806 Mr. Jefferson, the apostle of democracy, signed the bill for the road from Cumberland to Wheeling.

Mr. Monroe in his message to Congress words the processity of lib.

Mr. Monroe, in his message to Congress, urged the necessity of liberal appropriations to such objects of internal improvements as were national in their character and design. He recommended the construction of a road from this city to New Orleans. This may be found in Gales & Seaton's Debates of Congress, volume 1.

In these times, Mr. Chairman, Virginia gave the key-note to the politics of the Union. Here, then, were democratic Presidents recommending in their messages the very principle which we maintain in this bill; and, sir, they were sustained in Congress by the democratic Representatives of the States.

In vain may we cite them to the great Carolinian who is on record declaring the constitutionality of this almost identical enterprise. His powers of induction and analysis are at fault in this instance, I suppose. We refer our friends to the honored names of Benton, and Polk, and Douglas, and we might add, did time allow, to a host of others, if perchance the patriotic services and fame of these great men shall lend potency to the argument. And, what might be still more preponderating, it cannot be denied that the democratic party from time immemorial have admitted the power of Congress to vote money to the improvement of rivers running through two or more States, holding that such rivers constituted national commercial highways. Now, will any one claim that a great transcontinental railway is less a national commercial highway than a river running through two States? Ay, but we are met, that Congress can vote lands but cannot vote money. Are not the lands the property of the General Government, and are they not convertible into money? Then, where is the difference? It is a distinction without a difference.

is the difference? It is a distinction without a difference.

Were I asked for the power to grant this aid, I would proudly and confidently point to the clause in the Constitution which declares that Congress has the power to establish post-roads. It even declares rivers post-routes. Certainly it might declare and authorize the con-rivers post-routes. Certainly it might declare and authorize the construction of a railway for a post-road.

Again, Congress has the power to regulate commerce among the States, &c. How better can commerce be regulated; how better can the essential constituent of commerce, which is freedom, be preserved, than by means of railway transportation? The railroad has become so necessary to commerce, that it may be said to be its most important promoter and its most effective agent.

Government has the right unquestionably to make roads for the transportation of its armies and munitions of war. This power is inseparable from its existence as an independent political power. There is no need of a direct grant of authority to do that, since it is founded in the first law of nature, self-existence. Rome constructed her great historic ways, which to-day perpetuate her glories more than her temple or coliseum, her senators or her heroes, handed down in history. Every nation has built its roads and deepened its rivers. General Jackson, as commander of the volunteers of the State of Tennessee in 1814, by direction of the Fresident of the United States, Mr. Madison, a Virginia strict constructionist, opened through the wilderness from Tennessee to Natchez a military road, for which Congress appropriated $5,000 to be applied within the limits of the State of Tennessee, the only appropriation that was ever made by Congress for the building of roads of any kind in that State, as before stated. But the principle of the power is as well illustrated by that grant as though hundreds of millions were involved.

Congress has the power to admit new States. Now, would any one suppose that that seemingly simple grant would carry along with it such an immense range of powers? Why, sir, under that power the United States from thirteen States—half of them of inconsiderable size—have grown to be a mighty Republic stretching from the lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, with thirty-seven stars upon its flag and with territory sufficient to largely increase the number of States. Under it the great apostle of democracy, Mr. Jefferson, purchased Louisiana Territory from Napoleon, extending from the Belize to the forty-second parallel of north latitude, and along with it the exclusive navigation of the Mississippi River, embracing an empire within itself—a district of country which to-day has well-nigh grasped the scepter of political power so long held by the North and East. Under this power the Floridas were purchased of Spain; under it Texas was annexed; under it our Mexican acquisitions were made, and which to-day we seek to bind more closely to us by the construction of this road.

Now, if this vast territorial domain can be acquired under this power to admit new States, would it be a violent stretch of power to open those Territories up to immigration and settlement and enable them to become self-sustaining political communities or States, and thus relieve the General Government of the expense of supporting their governments? If so, how better could this end be attained—and all must admit that it is laudable—than by facilitating the means of transportation and intercommunication with them?

Sir, it is idle in the face of these facts and principles to deny the constitutionality of this measure. A fair construction of the instrument itself warrants the conclusion that the bill is not in conflict with the Constitution. The very recent decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the Union Pacific Railway decides and settles the whole question, leaving no doubts as to the constitutionality.

Southern men standing guard over dreamy theories of the Constitution is "love's labor lost." Nor is that all that is lost—the opportunities of their own homes and constituencies are lost. I hope never to see the States obliterated from the map of our common country. To them, in my judgment, is intrusted the guardianship of property and personal liberty; but it is not wise, nor is it the best mode to maintain and preserve the rights of the States by assuming powers that do not belong to them and by denying to the central Government powers plainly vested in it by the Constitution.

While as a matter of public utility there has from the foundation of the Government always been a class of persons in this country opposed to this system of Government aid even for national highways, and I confess that I have inveighed, not against its unconstitutionality, but against its sectional injustice and favoritism, the time has come at last when this policy, which has prevailed despite the efforts of those who opposed it, whether upon the ground of unconstitutionality or of inexpediency, must be equalized throughout the country. Had a different policy prevailed there might be some reason for not entering upon it now; but since the North, East, and West have been made the fortunate recipients of this beneficence, it seems but fair that the system should be extended so as to embrace that section of the Union which alone has been neglected. With these stubborn facts confronting us, how any Representative from this neglected section can reconcile it to his convictions of duty to oppose this bill, passes my comprehension.

It will not do to seek shelter behind the Constitution. Even a strict construction of that instrument will not afford protection to the opponents of this measure, as I have shown. And if southern statesmanship should refuse to plant itself upon the higher level of more liberal ideas and progressive policy which all parties now claim has obtained and thereby should dash the golden chalice from their lips, declining all kindly proffer of assistance; indeed withholding by their own direct agency this meed of justice, thereby riveting the fetters of poverty and perpetuating the burdens of hopeless taxation and political degradation and inequality for all time—turning abruptly away from our shores the stream of immigration and capital so much needed and desired by our people, which alone can re-instate our impoverished social and political systems and again enrich them with the life currents of material prosperity—I say, sir, if this is the rôle of southern statesmanship, then indeed am I no judge of what constitutes the duty of a southern statesman in this the critical hour of our civilization.

But a voice comes to us from away among the mountains of Virginia. The disciple of Calhoun, who for long years sitting as at the feet of Gamaliel, and who now, in the grandeur of his character, the honesty of his motives, and the integrity of his patriotism, would cast no reproach upon the past, but would lend every effort for the hopefulness of the future and the prosperity of his country, in an able letter addressed to the distinguished chairman of the Pacific Railroad Committee, abjuring southern Representatives to beware how they are led away from their practical duties at this time by strained constructions of the teachings of the State-rights school, in speaking of this identical enterprise, Hon. R. M. T. Hunter says:

To prevent so grand an achievement by interposing objections derived by an extreme extension of the State-rights doctrine, where there is neither use nor necessity for it, is only to bring into odium and ridicule those grand old bulwarks of human liberty, those prime defenses of American harmony and progress.

In all the theories of rehabilitation, and in all the modes of improvement and development which the wide range discussion has taken of that subject, no plan, next to good government, presents such speedy and thorough relief as the construction of this link in the great international highway for the transit of the world's commerce.

and thorough relief as the construction of this link in the great international highway for the transit of the world's commerce.

Among enlightened statesmen of all political faiths the sectional jealousies and feuds engendered by the late sanguinary war in a great measure have passed away. Let us build this road, and the Southern States, so highly favored by nature, will again pour their rich treasures into the markets of the world doubling the value of their exports, securing to the United States an increased trade; in a word, becoming at once great and powerful States, united to their sisters under a common Constitution, with no other ambition than a common destiny. Place these States and people once more upon their feet, and a decade will not pass by before every section of the Union will feel and realize the benefits from such a policy, and will rejoice in our recovery and restoration; and instead of southern prosperity diminishing the general weal, it will but add to it, and intensify and expand the national power and glory.

The South, with unequaled natural resources, from a variety of causes, political, social, and revolutionary, lags behind in the race of progress. Her 19,800 miles of railroads languish for the sustenance which this magnificent main trunk artery would afford which this magnificent main trunk artery would afford.

If the natural fertility of our soil, its normal adaptation to every variety almost of production, with our genial climate, in spite of the political drawbacks and social disorders which usually follow great and violent revolutions, can and have in such a material manner helped to swell our annual foreign budget, I ask is it wise to insist upon a policy which restrains and represses the efforts of the people of these States in their laudable endeavors to regain their material prosperity? Do not wise statesmanship and an enlightened policy advise a liberal, fostering, and just encouragement; a policy which stimulates their energies to the highest degree, animates the people with renewed hope, strengthens their confidence, opens the way to enable them to rebuild their shattered fortunes and kindle anew the smouldering fires of patriotism which long and cruel neglect has partially smothered?

The building of this road would in an incredibly brief space of time transform the whole South. Her rich plantations, once the home of comfort and thrift, many of them have now become the scenes of dilapidation and decay; and instead of her cities and towns, many of them being the seats of opulence and culture, are with rare exceptions passing beneath the baleful shadow of decadence and often bankruptey, and all are colored with "the sere and yellow leaf;" but give the South this "letter of credit," and not only would the honest industry of that people be awakened to renewed vigor, but the laboring masses all along its line would take hope again. Soon the workshops and factories now closed as if clad in mourning would greet the ear with the busy hum of their activities, and the neglected farms the ear with the busy hum of their activities, and the neglected farms would put on a brighter livery, and the smile of "hope long deferred" will once more radiate the countenances of a people weary with their burdens. Then will the whole commercial and industrial system of the South be vitalized by the ten thousand streams of wealth and genial influences which this railway connection of the Atlantic and Pacific shall infuse into it, realizing in its fullest and Attantic and Facine shall infuse into it, realizing in its infest and broadest sense the transcendent advantages which accrue to such a highly-favored location, that of being immediately on the great world-wide thoroughfare which bears upon the bosoms of oceans and across continents the commerce of the whole earth. Then, too, will those lofty dreams of destray be realized in which the profound minds of Calhoun and Benton reveled, and which their unerring ken pointed out over a quarter of a centum ago, now nearly the average ago of a of Calhoun and Benton reveied, and which their unerring ken pointed out over a quarter of a century ago, now nearly the average age of a human life. Who, I ask, shall measure the advantages to the whole Republic which with so little effort will become practical realities while now they only "cast their shadows before?"

In the passage of this bill is contained the only measure of financial relief which I have dared to hope for from this Congress. oncilable views of the majorities in the two Houses of Congress and, if that were not so, the known antagonism of the President to any liberal financial scheme, utterly preclude all hope of the adop-tion of any measure of relief for the business interests of the country, now staggering over the abyse of universal bankruptcy. The founcial registers tell us that over seven thousand business firms in the United States suspended in 1874, and in 1875 over five thousand did the same thing. Look in whatever direction you will there are the wrecks of fortunes, blasted expectations, and ruined estates. Property is an incumbrance, and fails to produce the revenue with which erty is an incumbrance, and fails to produce the revenue with which to pay annual taxes, and strong men become anxious lest their wives and little ones may want bread; in hundreds of thousands of cases they do want bread, and their cries go unheeded. With all this we are told there is too much money. Yes, there is plenty in the hands of capitalists and bankers, but it is so hedged around by protective legislation and the privileges of monopoly that it dictates its own terms of circulation and investment, and where real estate or property is mortgaged for its temporary use, the foreclosure amounts to practical confiscation. The fact is well understood by the people that the laws have been framed to magnify the purchasing power of money and to decrease or diminish the capacity of land and other property to pay debts. property to pay debts.

But the panacea for all this panic, want of confidence, and general distress, in the estimation of some gentlemen on this floor, is resump-tion of specie payment. Why, silver to-day is worth less than greention of specie payment. Why, silver to-day is worth less than greenbacks. But resumption in gold! That is, pay to the creditor the $100 the debtor owes him besides $13 premium, and all then will be well. In other words, tax the indebtedness of the Government and people 13 per cent. that the financial Utopia of resumption may be reached; that is, to relieve the distress of the people, add still more to their burdens by lessening the circulating medium and requiring gold in the payment of debts. The gold is not in the country. The whole American product of gold does not pay over half of our foreign and home interest.

If the fear of resumption has stopped the mills and factories, the forges and furnaces, suspended business in a thousand forms and thrown upon the land millions of idle hands, until the whole country is panting as with a stroke of paralysis, what would be the effect of resumption in fact? Now, sir, I am candid when I declare it to be my solemn conviction, after having brought to the subject much labor and research, and after giving it the benefit of my best but humble abilities, that the path to relief and renewed prosperity does not lie through contraction, but rather expansion of the powers of the body-politic. The patient does not need depletion and starvation, but, on the contrary, plain and generous nutriment. Yet one of the ablest on the contrary, plain and generous nutriment. Yet one of the ablest members of this House declares that his only objection to this bill is its tendency, strange to say, to postpone specie payment. That is the way to bring it about, in my opinion.

Useless extravagance should be avoided both by the people and the Government, a sensible and frugal economy should be practiced. At the same time it is in the power of the Government to give an impetus to all kinds of industry and traffic by putting this great enterprise upon a solid foundation.

Tens of thousands, yes, perhaps, directly and indirectly, hundreds of thousands of idle hands, now only consumers, will be converted into producers; trade will revive, confidence will be restored, capital will creep out of its hiding-places and seek investment; millions of dollars in the Old World, now rusting for the want of use, will rush to our renewed and revived country; our farms will be extended, our shops will be increased, labor will exert itself, and productions will multiply, until our exports will exceed our imports; gold will flow in upon us, the balance of trade will be in our favor, when the difference between coin and paper money will disappear, and resumption, the long and much-desired end, will be reached ere we are aware of it, with loss and depression to none.

It might be profitable to study the recent able and successful financial policy of France, by which she recovered from the disasters of the late invasion by Prussia. With two of her provinces torn from her bleeding body, she has paid her indemnity of $1,000,000,000 in gold, and to-day is in a more prosperous condition financially than her victorious conqueror, who, like the United States, has contracted her currency and repressed the energies of her people and forced them into idleness, and made them consumers instead of producers. the close of the war, issued legal-tenders, revived her industries, set all of her population at work, and soon her exports exceeded her imports, and the gold returning for her exports she was enabled to pay off her and the gold returning for her exports she was enabled to pay off her foreign debt. Her exports last year amounted to $225,000,000 more than they did ten years ago. Instead of gold being the cause of her increased exports and revived industries and general prosperity, it is the result of these things. Specie payments in gold followed the liberal policy and the national and individual prosperity, rather than preceded it. With this enlightened fiscal policy she unites a liberal system of interval improvements and under the influence of the two system of internal improvements, and under the influence of the two together the nation has never before enjoyed a brighter prospect for

In our own country the financial crash which followed the conclusion of the war of 1812 about reached its height in 1817. New York and Pennsylvania determined upon a system of turnpike-building and giving aid to companies to do the same thing. Did not the splendid system of canals in New York owe its paternity to financial depression? And were they not constructed during a time of great pressure for the purpose of affording relief to the people?

It has been said that Pennsylvania projected her first railroad to protect her citizens from the devastation of financial depression. I do not advocate the theory that government should become paternal, or that, as a principle, it should favor local enterprises; but I do most emphatically declare that at an unprecedented time like this, when neighbor refuses to trust his neighbor and whole communities are heighfor refuses to trust his heighfor and whole communities are bankrupt and idle, in the presence of a great and overwhelming specter which sits like the angel of night brooding over every interest in the land except the strong-box of the capitalist and banker, that it is the duty of the Government, where it is well secured, to lend its credit to a great enterprise like this that promises the most successful issue and would be followed by a revival of trade, by renewed hope and and would be followed by a revival of trade, by renewed hope and confidence among the people, and general prosperity in business. Such is my answer in brief to those who think well of this bill but who are deterred from voting for it because they think it may prolong the period of resumption of specie payment.

any immediate connection with any point upon the Mississippi River; and the local jealousies of rival points tended still more to widen the breach and prevent that harmony and union so essential to succ Fortunately that cause of disagreement is obviated in the present bill, by providing for branches from the eastern terminus of the main trunk to New Orleans, Vicksburgh, and Memphis. And in the event these branch roads are not commenced in good faith by companies obtaining charters from the States of Louisiana and Arkansas within one year, then it is made the duty of this company to build these branches within three years from the date of the passage of this bill.

Who will undertake to measure the value of the stake which the Southern States hold in this great measure of relief—Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina on account of their commercial connections, and Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, and Kentucky on account of their vast deposits of coal and iron and agricultural resources, which, without some such stimulus as the building of this road will give, must for many years remain undeveloped? The State which I have the honor in part to represent has a coal area of thirty-seven hundred square miles, while Alabama has forty-three hundred square miles. Iron ore of the best quality abounds in exhaustless quantities in both States. These coal-fields, ore-beds, quarries of limestone, and most excellent timber all lie adjacent to each other. Pig-iron is being manufactured in Tennessee at a cost of $15 per ton, very little over what the coal and ore can be had at in Pennsylvania. Capital cannot find in the civilized world a more inviting field for investment and enterprise than in the Southern States.

Gentlemen of the South, can we longer afford to haggle over ex-ploded theories of government, when in fact the Government and the orld is moving ahead and bids us follow if we would not supinely

This road will bring the remote sections of the Union into close harmony and affinity. As it spans the rivers, crosses the plains; and scales or tunnels the mountains, it practically annihilates the remoteness of the sections, thereby strengthening the cords of union and brotherhood. No stronger guarantee of future peace can be made between the widely separated people of the States of this Union. Not even the common traditions of glorious memories nor the enduring parchment of organic laws can knit the people of the Alleghanies and of the States of the states and states are states of the states of the states and states are states and states are states and states are states and states are states are states and states are sta of the Sierra Nevadas more closely together than these bars of iron will link them. The steam-engine has become the great civilizer and educator. Wherever it has penetrated it has carried commerce, civ-

Mexico. It is so in our Western Territories.

The achievements in physical science are rapidly revolutionizing the nations of the earth. The great motors of civilization which marked the ages since the dawn of the Reformation to the close of the eighteenth century were grand moral truths and metaphysical intellections. The Old World, guided by the light which the genius of a Bacon or a Milton shed upon it, advanced high the standard of purely intellectual development. In no age of the world, not even when Homer sang or Cæsar wrote, did the power of human thought sway over human destiny such an imperial scepter. Out of the profound depths of learning and mental activity possessed by a few during the Middle Ages, issued the school of the Reformation, which the faith and genius of Luther illustrated, and from which sprang as by a natural lineal of Luther illustrated, and from which sprang as by a natural lineal descent the political axioms which eventually crystallized into that liberty which asserted itself at Runnymede, and finally crowned our own Revolution with immortal and unfading triumph. But it has been reserved for a Fulton, a Morse, a Whitney, and a Maury to set in motion a few laws of physical science which, while they do not contradict or conflict with the well-established principles of moral and political science, have produced the most astounding results in the domain of civilization. These great physical agencies of electricity and steam, harnessed under the direction of human genius to the car of science, have substituted the labor of untold millions of the car of science, have substituted the labor of untold millions of hands and have reconstructed the map of nations and the geography of the world. Countries distinct and separate have been assimilated and consolidated, and continents remote and inaccessible have been made contiguous. But of these agencies the railroad has led the way. Wherever its iron track has marked the continents, the car of progress and civilization has followed. Before the curling smoke of the locomotive the wild and untutored savage has either fled to other wilds or has felt and acknowledged its civilizing influences.

Under the eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, signed February 2, 1848, our Government solemnly stipulated with Mexico to protect her citizens from the depredations of the Indian tribes inhabiting Territories of the United States, promising the fullest indemnity for all losses or injuries which might be inflicted by the savages upon the persons or property of Mexican citizens. How can that protection be better or cheaper afforded than by the means of this thirty-second parallel road?

In case of war with any foreign power, the Pacific coast being most remote from the centers of population and from the Central Government, and being our weakest defense, would most likely be suggested by military strategy as the point of assault. In such an event it would be of the utmost importance that the Pacific coast should be connected with the States east of the mountains by a road upon the thirty-second parallel as well as by the present line town in operation. The successful defense of California against foreign invasion might depend upon the existence of this southern line; at least grave temporary results might be averted; and beyond all doubt very great expense and heavy outlays might and would in case of invasion be saved in the transportation of men, munitions, and supplies. This railway, and the telegraph, which has become almost universally a concomi-tant, would afford safer protection to our fellow-citizens who bask in the vernal sunshine and are fanned by the balmy zephyrs of the golden State than if the Pacific coast "should be guarded by a hundred frown-ing bastions, or its harbors should be covered with floating batteries" that wake the very echoes of old ocean herself

The building of this road will save many millions by diminishing the Army and by affording cheaper and more reliable transportation for men and supplies. A committee of the Forty-third Congress estimated in a report made to that body that the Government would save $10,000,000 in the annual cost of the Army by its reduction and in cheapening transportation. It will also save to the Government several millions of dollars annually in the way of cheapening postal and telegraphic facilities. It will open direct communication between Saint Louis, now the commercial emporium and distributing center of the great West and the Pacific coast upon equal terms with other cities, which boon is now denied that great region on account of the selfish policy of the Union Pacific Company refusing to prorate with the Kansas and Pacific Railroad Company.

The masses of the people in the Southern States have only to demand of their Representatives in Congress a united support of this bill to secure its passage. The strongest argument yet advanced against the proposition is the want of unity among ourselves. Genagainst the proposition is the want of limity among ourselves. Gentlemen of the North feel in their very hearts the justice of this measure, and would doubtless support it but for the consideration that some southern members oppose it. They do not feel willing to assume the responsibility before their constituents of recording their votes for it, when the record shows that southern Representatives stand in opposition. Hence the responsibility upon gentlemen from the South becomes a very grave one. Shall it be told the people of the South that her own members gave the fatal blow to her hopes? That through their dissensions, indifference, or opposition outright, our generous friends in the North and East and West were forced into opposition for purposes of self-defense before their own constituencies?

Mr. Chairman, there is one fact which I desire in a most emphatic manner to acknowledge. I refer to the noble and patriotic views and sentiments of unaffected sympathy which I have heard gentlemen, members of this House, of opposite politics to myself, express in behalf of the bleeding section from which I come. Sir, if I know anyhalf of the bleeding section from which I come. Sir, if I know anything of the feelings and opinions of the southern people, it is that they are tired of excitement, of crimination, and of sectional hate. They would, if allowed by sectional partisans, be on terms of perfect amity and concord. Had not the insane policy of reconstruction involved both the danger of losing their liberties and the destruction of their property, the people of the Southern States would have been almost entirely without partisan bias. As it is, if let alone, they are thinking about keeping the wolf from the door, about improving their wasted places and decaying homes, rather than indulging in dreams of empire, of political dynasties, and successions. They would look upon the construction of this road as the strongest, most unmistakable, and substantial proof of the good feeling of the people of the Northern States, and with feelings welling with kindness and recipro-cal sympathy, would gracefully acknowledge the generosity of the act, by throwing open both their hearts and homes with the abandon of the most prodigal hospitality. As it is, we hope we cherish no reveng-

The friends of this measure from the South decline to connect this proposition with the party politics of the day. We desire to lift it to a higher plane than that of mere partyism. The South cannot afford to advertise her material interests to be bartered for in the political market. We are fearfully in earnest about this matter. We need We want it upon the soundest basis to be devised. desire the bill to be submitted to the critical test of discussion, and we expect and will accept every amendment which is offered in good faith to perfect the bill in the interests of the people, the Government, and the commerce of the country. The commerce of the country and the products of labor have paid tribute long enough to a heartless monopoly; let us now have an independent highway under the complete control of the people's representatives, with low freights and fares, and accessible to every line of railway which may wish to constitute it is the control of the people's representatives. nect with it; then will transportation and production settle in the scales of justice to an exact equipoise when commerce shall be emancipated from the fetters of monopoly, and, being regulated by great natural laws, its freedom shall be proclaimed as the policy of this country.

This connecting link upon the isothermal line of the thirty-second parallel between the oceans cannot fail of completion, nor can its construction be much longer delayed. The fiat of the people which makes and unmakes Presidents, Senators, and Representatives has gone forth. Its demand upon this Congress is imperative and inexorable. row plea of party advantage will avail with the people. If this enterprise is made partisan, Congressmen have made it so, not the people. Their interests every way demand the adoption of a different policy. The industrial interests and commerce of no State of this Union, whether South or not, should be subordinated to and squared by the procrustean beds of party platforms.

This grand conception, long the favorite thought of Calhoun and Benton and Clay, like many other grand ideas, at first scouted, but finally triumphant and accepted, has struggled through the mists of error, ignorance, and prejudice, until it now finds, I believe, not an enlightened opponent to doubt its feasibility and importance. The only opposition arises as to the manner of its construction. But soon that will disappear in the light of a great and overwhelming national necessity. The more it is discussed and agitated, the stronger it commends itself to public confidence. Like the oak upon the mountain, moored in the rifted rock, the ruder the storm-king shall break through its limbs and tear its branches and beat upon its gnarled trunk, the firmer it becomes rooted to its granite foundations.

Mr. Chairman, as a great measure of economy, of peace between the East and the far West, of peace between the Government and the Indian tribes, of maintaining a treaty of peace with our turbulent neighbor, Mexico, of protection to the people against the merciless exall, should Congress grant the aid of the loan of its credit to this company because it is right, and because the Southern States need this aid, and most respectfully ask it at the hands of their Northern sisters.

REDUCTION OF EXPENDITURES.

Mr. COCHRANE. Mr. Chairman, it is with no little pleasure that I arise to express my cordial approval of the main features of the appropriation bill now under consideration. The promises which public men make to their constituents should always be kept sacred. It is a matter to be deplored that those high in office so often forget the pledges which they have made to their people at home; and that, too, often when the fair promises which they have made have served to secure their election. This forgetfulness is not always attributable to a lack of principle, but more frequently springs from the multitudinous cares and worries incident to the position which they hold. If the members of this House entered into any solemn covenant with their constituents, it was that they would inaugurate a system of retrenchment and reform.

All over our broad land, from every city and town, village and hamlet, the cry of a suffering people went up demanding that the prodigal expenditures of public money should cease, and that the affairs of the Government should be controlled by honest men. That corruption in high places prevailed to an alarming extent, that the public money was being squandered, were facts well known to the people. For years they had appealed to the party in power for re-lief; but instead of their condition becoming better it became worse, lief; but instead of their condition becoming better it became worse, until finally in 1874, rising in their might, they swept from this House the republican majority which had so long controlled it, and, placing us here, demanded with all the earnestness begotten of suffering that we give them the relief which they so much needed. Our path was a plain one, our duty clear. First, we were to discover and expose those in office guilty of corruption; second, we were to adopt a system of rigid economy in the administration of public affairs.

This House is certainly deserving of congratulation for its faithful performance of duty thus far. Through the earnest efforts of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, one of the highest officials in the land (the late Secretary of War) has been shown to have been guilty of the highest crimes, and his infamous practices have been exposed to the eye of the nation and the world. Other equally alarming developments will likely be made before the present ession closes, and doubtless many of those who have long enjoyed the public confidence and esteem will share the fate of Mr. Belknap. It can certainly be no pleasure to this House to thus detect and expose corruption and fraud where only honesty and purity should exist, but the duty is an imperative one and will be faithfully and fearlessly performed. Its performance is demanded not by any political party, but by the honest masses of the people of the country.

I cannot agree with those who assume that there is no virtue outside of the democratic party. I believe that the great masses of the American people are honest. The day has passed when party whips will serve to lash the people within party lines. The question asked by the people now is not whether a candidate for public office is a democrat or a republican, but rather, "Is he an honest man, and is he capable of filling creditably the position to which he aspires." We democrats who occupy these seats one our election not to the fact democrats who occupy these seats owe our election not to the fact that we are democrats, but rather to the fact that our constituents had confidence in our integrity, and believed that they could rely upon our faithfully serving them.

It has been hinted in some of the newspapers that the investigations now being conducted by the committees of this House will disclose the fact that certain members of the democratic party have been connected with the frauds which have been perpetrated. However this may be, let the investigations go on; let no effort be spared to discover the offenders, and let the most severe punishment be in-flicted upon the guilty, irrespective of the party to which they may belong. I here declare in this presence that if it should be discovered belong. I here declare in this presence that if it should be discovered that any democrat has been robbing the people, or directly or indirectly aiding and abetting others in a violation of law, I will cheerfully join hands with the republicans in this House to expose and punish him. In the discovery and punishment of crime we should dismiss all party passion and prejudice and heartily co-operate with each other. Forgetting all political differences, we should press forward in the utmost earnestness to accomplish the great work before us.

It is greatly to be regretted that certain gentlemen upon the other side of this House should have so far forgotten themselves as to seek to cover up the atrocity of the crimes of the late Secretary of War by to cover up the atrocity of the crimes of the late Secretary of War by an attack upon the members of the committee who detected and ex-posed those crimes. I think I can safely say that no democrat here would stoop to such action, however great the danger which threat-

This House also deserves credit for the efforts which it has made to reduce the expenses of the Government. The Military Academy bill, which recently passed the House, appropriated $105,509 less than the sum appropriated for a similar purpose by the last (Forty-third) Congress. The consular bill appropriated $460,737.50 less, and the fortification bill $722,000 less than were respectively appropriated by the last Congress for similar purposes. Thus in these three bills there is an aggregate saving to the Government of the large sum of $1,288,246.50.

It is matter worthy of notice that the sums estimated as being necessary and demanded by republican officials to cover the expenses of the Military Academy, consular and diplomatic service, and to provide fortifications and armament thereof, and torpedoes, are so greatly in excess of the sums really necessary for those purposes. In the matter of the Military Academy, the late Secretary of War (Mr. Belknap) requested an appropriation of $437,470. The appropriation granted by this House, however, was $259,231. The estimate for the consular and diplomatic service was $1,352,485. The appropriation made was $914,247.50.

The estimate for fortifications, &c., was $3,406,000; the amount appropriated for that purpose was $315,000. The aggregate amount appropriated for the purposes mentioned was about $1,488,478.50; whereas the amount demanded was $5,195,955. The great excess of the amount demanded over the amount really necessary is calculated to give rise to the most grave apprehensions. Such a demand will certainly not be favorably received by an already impoverished people.

The appropriation bill now under consideration, however, is of much greater importance than any of a like character which have pre-ceded it, for by this bill it is proposed to save the enormous sum of $5,724,417.39. The amount appropriated by the last Congress for similar purposes was $18,734,225. The amount now proposed to be appropriated is $13,009,807.61. In addition to the amount thus saved there is a further saving in the matter of official postage-stamps of more than $100,000. If we look at the amount which the several Departments ask that we should now appropriate, we are startled at its proportions. The aggregate amount estimated is $20,836,307.50. This amount is $2,102,082.50 more than was appropriated by the last Congress and $7,826,499.89 more than is proposed to be appropriated by the present bill. These figures need not be commented upon. They speak for themselves, and will beyond doubt be carefully scanned by a people already overburdened with taxation.

There are some few objectionable features about the present bill, however, which are worthy of notice. The chief and most important of these is the great reduction of the appropriation for labor in the United States mints and assay offices. A reference to the appropriation bill of the last (Forty-third) Congress will disclose the fact that $250,000 were appropriated for the wages of workmen and adjusters in the Mint at Philadelphia. The present bill appropriates only $200,000 for that purpose. The former bill appropriated $85,000 for wages of workmen and adjusters at the mint at Carson, Nevada. The present bill appropriates only $20,000 for that purpose. former bill appropriated $275,000 for wages of workmen and adjusters in the mint at San Francisco, California. The present bill appropriates only $225,000 for that purpose. The former bill appropriated $15,335 for wages of workmen at the mint at Denver, Colorada. The present bill appropriates only $10,000 for that purpose. The former bill appropriated $50,000 for wages of workmen at the assay office at New York. The present bill only appropriates $20,000 for that purpose.

A comparison of the appropriation bill of the Forty-third with that of the Forty-second Congress will show that the appropriations for wages to laborers at the places mentioned are almost identical. Why is it that so great a reduction is proposed in the present bill? The very last class of people in the country to strike at is the class of laboring-men. I do not understand it to be contended that the wages which for years have been paid to the laborers in the mints are too high. If it can be satisfactorily shown that the number of laborers is too great, that the Government does not require the services of so and if the present appropriations are sufficient to pay reasonable living wages to all who are employed, there can be no objection to the provisions of the bill referred to.

But if it be a fact that the Government will employ as many laborreduction, I will feel compelled to oppose it. The laboring-men of this country are entitled to consideration, and their interests should ever be faithfully guarded. True it is that the capital of the country should be protected. It is contained and their interests should ever be faithfully guarded. should be protected. It is certainly entitled to proper legislation, but while we are thus protecting capital we should not forget the claims of labor. So long as I occupy official position I shall ever strive to protect the interests of the laboring-men of my district and country. The aggregate amount proposed to be deducted from the amount of last year's appropriation is $200,335. Surely this is a very great loss to fall upon the workingmen and their families, and no such reduction should be made unless clearly necessary and proper.

I also think that the reduction in the wages of the employés of the

I also think that the reduction in the wages of the employés of the post-office department of the House is too great. By comparing their present salary with the amount proposed in this bill to be paid, it will be found that there is a reduction of about 60 per cent. in their wages. This I regard as being too great. These employés have very onerous and responsible duties to perform; and while in the general reduction which is being made in salaries they should not entirely escape. I think that the proposed reduction is far from reasonable. scape, I think that the proposed reduction is far from reasonable. Again, the great reduction of force in the folding department may not prove a wise or proper thing.

Again, it is a grave question whether there is a sufficient appropriation for the Post-Office Department. Of all Government departments no one has greater demands made upon it by the people than the Department of which we are now speaking. The people of the country are clamorous in their demands that new post-offices shall Thus the business of the Department is constantly increasing. In my judgment a liberal provision should be made for this Department. We should not appropriate too much money, but we should be sure that we are appropriating enough to cover all expenses. If, however, the workingmen at the mints should be fully paid, the post-office employés receive a just compensation, and the present number of folders be retained, the great fact still remains that the passage of this bill will save to the country more that $5,000,000.

The great majority of the provisions of the bill are worthy of the highest commendation and reflect great credit upon the Committee on Appropriations. The whole bill bears evidence of great research and exhaustive labor. There can be no doubt but that the various Departments of the Government here have been overcrowded with A far greater number have been employed than clerks and employés. clerks and employes. A far greater number have been employed than were necessary to do the work. The salaries, too, have, in many instances, been high and often greatly in excess of the amount which should have been paid for the work done. By reducing these salaries and diminishing the number of employes a great deal of money will be saved to the people.

There is one provision in the bill which should receive the unauimous support of the House, and that is the provision reducing the salary of Senators and Congressmen. Under ordinary circumstances I do not think that the sum of $5,000, is too much for the members of the Senate and House to receive. The expenses incident to a winter residence in Washington are so great that it requires some economy to make the salary pay expenses. But, while this is true, we should not forget that we are living in no ordinary times. Never has there been greater suffering throughout the country than that which prevails to-day. We no longer hear the busy hum of industry, which greeted our ears but a few years ago; every manufacturing and business interest in the country is suffering. The arm of trade is paralized. There is little demand for labor. Thousands of men and women in every State throughout the country, unable to obtain employment, are dependent upon charity for their daily sustenance. Examine the dockets of our bankrupt courts and you will there find the names of a multitude of those who once were numbered among our most wealthy and prosperous. Want and misery stalk through the land. Surely in view of these facts we should cheerfully deprive ourselves of some luxuries, if not necessities, and by so doing lend our mite toward lightening the burdens of the people.

I was surprised at a statement made by my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. Townsend] in his speech of Saturday last. In opposing the passage of the present bill he said:

We are now on an upward movement. We are moving on the incoming wave of a renewed prosperity. We have touched the bottom of our disasters, and we are now emerging from the trials and troubles imposed upon us by an inflated currency and an unfortunate system of finance, the resulting incidents of the late rebellion. I say that we are emerging from that unfortunate condition, and our furnaces, forges, and manufactories are opening their doors and setting their machinery again in motion; at least I know that is so in the district I have the honor to

I will not dispute the accuracy of the honorable gentleman's statement so far as his own district is concerned, although it strikes me as very singular that there should be a return to prosperity while the causes which brought disaster are not removed. We still have an "inflated currency," and there has been no recent change in the "unfortunate system of finance." The honorable gentleman does not, however, accurately picture the present condition of the manufacturing interests of the country at large. The "wave" of which he speaks has expended its force in his district. Its effects have been unfelt The people of my district are still struggling amid the gloom of financial embarrassment, and their condition is that of the people of the whole country.

If my colleague, however, were correct in his statement, there could still be no necessity for Congress to appropriate an amount of money largely in excess of the amount required. However prosperous we are as a nation, the money of the people should not be foolishly frittered away. Among the reductions made by this bill, and to which the honorable gentleman objects, is the reduction of 10 per cent. upon the salary of the officer in charge of the Pension Office.

The statement is made that-that gentleman was brought here in the expectation that he would receive $3,000 a

The basis of this expectation is not stated. The reduction proposed is certainly not large and should not be made the subject of complaint. The Bureau of Pensions is not likely to remain long in its present condition. It has been proposed to transfer that Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department. A bill for that purpose has already been introduced in this House by the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, [Mr. Jenks.] Should this bill pass there will be an immense saving to the people.

I will not attempt at this time to go over the various items of this bill in detail. It may and doubtless will be necessary to make slight changes and modifications in some of its provisions, but I heartily indorse that which it is intended to accomplish, namely, a saving of an enormous amount of public money.

We should not, however, stop with the passage of this bill. The work of retrenchment must be carried on further. Wherever money can reasonably be saved it should be saved. Necessary internal improvements should not be neglected; but all large appropriations for improvements, however useful, but the making of which could be delayed without injury, should be avoided. When we shall have established a wise system of finance, afforded adequate protection to home industries, and inaugurated a reign of economy, then, and not till then, will our country emerge from the darkness which enshrouds it and bask in the sunshine of peace and prosperity.

and bask in the sunshine of peace and prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MILLER.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Cochrane] for the courtesy of yielding the unexpired portion of his hour to a political opponent.

I wish to make a few remarks by way of explanation of the vote that I shall give upon this bill and of the votes I have given and shall continue to give upon all bills looking to a reduction of salaries. The rule that seems to me just in dealing with these questions is this: Where a salary has been greatly raised since the war on the plea that the cost of living has been largely increased by the inflation of the currency, this fact is prima facie evidence that the salary is now too large and ought to be diminished. On the other hand, where a salary stands at the same amount as before the war, when the currency was on a specie basis, this fact is prima facie evidence that the salary is not now unreasonably high, and that this is not the place for a wise and just retrenchment.

Acting upon this rule, I voted for the reductions in the Military Academy appropriation bill proposed by the Committee on Appropriations. Those salaries had been raised by the law of 1857, and the committee did not propose to place them as low as they had been up to that date. I thought, and still think, that the committee were But when we came to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, we found the committee proposing to reduce salaries that had not been raised since the act of 1856. Those salaries were fixed at their present amount in the law of 1856, twenty years ago, under a democratic administration, when the currency was on a specie basis and when the cost of living as measured by any standard was not one-half what it is to-day. Surely, unless the law of 1856 was outrageously extravagant, there could be no necessity or apology for cutting down those salaries at the present time, and I confess that I could not understand by what rule of economy or of statesmanship the committee could justify their proposed reduction. At all events I could not justify it by any rule of mine, and so was compelled by my judgment to vote against the committee on most of the amendments offered.

Besides, sir, it seemed to me a most inopportune time either to reduce the number of our consuls and commercial agents, or to cheapen the qualifications of our foreign representatives. At a time when we were about bringing our currency up to the standard of the commercial nations of the world, and thus making it possible for our people to compete successfully in foreign trade and to regain something of their lost commerce, at such a time it seemed to me unwise to lessen our efforts to secure able representatives abroad or to reduce the number of our consuls and commercial agents in the various countries where we might expect to find a market for the products of our fac-tories and our farms. For these reasons, sir, I opposed the reduction of diplomatic salaries and also opposed the reduction of the number of our consuls and commercial agents which we now need more than ever before.

Now, sir, I come to the civil appropriation bill now before the House; and, by the rule already stated as governing my action, I must give it my support so far as it reduces salaries that have been greatly give it my support so far as it reduces salaries that have been greatly raised during and since the war, and raised upon the plea that the cost of living had been greatly increased. These salaries, like others, have been raised upon the plea, no doubt resting upon fact, that the cost of living has been greatly increased by the inflation of the currency. But the facts now being all reversed, the currency having been greatly appreciated, the price of every article of food and of clothing having been greatly reduced, and the country striving to get back once more upon the firm ground of specie payments, why, I ask, is not this a favorable and proper time to reduce salaries?

And, Mr. Chairman, it is an auspicious time to make the attempt for another reason, and the opportunity should not be lost. We are on the eve of a presidential election; each party is on its good behavior before the country. If salaries cannot be reduced now they never can be reduced, I care not what party is in power. I dislike very much to allude to party motives and party interests in this discussion, but, sir, we must deal with facts as they exist. I think it right and proper to use if possible party ambition and personal ambition to secure healthy legislation for the people. And I know that parties in this House do not stand on equal grounds in this competition. All will admit that while it requires a political virtue by no means too common to be willing to reduce the salaries of your political friends, it is a comparatively easy display of political economy to be willing to reduce the salaries of your political opponents and cut down the perquisites of offices which your friends have no prospect of filling. [Laughter.] It is very much like the patriotism of Artemas Ward's hero who was willing to send all his wife's relations to the war. But even this economy by proxy is not without its merit and may be turned to good account at the present time; and I sincerely trust the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. Randall,] who is known to the country as the champion of low salaries, at the present time at least, may be able to hold his party up to the mark of this high patriotism. And, sir, I can assure him I will join with any party in this House, and I trust with all parties, in reducing the salaries of all the officers of the Government which have been greatly raised within the last fifteen years, so far as we have the constitutional power to reach

Mr. Chairman, if the committee will indulge me further, I will state some of the advantages which I think will result from a fair and honest reduction of salaries. I pass by for the present the saving of four or five millions of dollars to the Treasury, although in our present depressed financial condition this is a consideration of no present depressed inancial condition this is a consideration of no small consequence. Yet, in my opinion, the incidental and collateral advantages of such legislation will be worth much more to the country than the money saved. In the first place, it may be expected to check that mad desire for governmental appointment which seems to have seized upon our brightest young men all over the country. Every member here has daily evidence of this growing folly. Young men of the finest talents and of good family connection, who, if they would but settle down to hard work in any of the occupations or professions of life, might soon become leading citizens of their coun professions of life, might soon become leading citizens of their counties, and might in a few years, if they choose, represent their constituents in State or national capitals, tempted by the higher temporary salaries offered by the Government, are now clamorous for appointments even to the most subordinate positions. We who are upon the ments even to the most subordinate positions. We who are upon the ground know what a misfortune success would be to them. Fortunately but few obtain places, while the great army of applicants stand waiting expectant and idle; and this, too, at a time of life when idleness and hesitancy are so fatal to future success. And this state of affairs is equally damaging to the employés in your Departments. The inroad of this new army of applicants fills every clerk with apprehension and anxiety. He is taught to believe that the retention of his position depends upon influence and not upon merit. The shadow of dependency falls upon his path; a shadow that always darkens if it does not blight.

Now, sir, I know no remedy for this state of things but to remove the cause of this fearful competition and scramble for place. And the cause is this: The Government is offering higher salaries for untried, inexperienced clerks than private business can afford to pay.

Government is offering inflation prices which private business has long ceased to offer. Now there is no other remedy for this evil than the one proposed. No competitive examination can check this rush of new applicants. As I have said, this class is made up of our brightest young men, fresh from their teachers and their books. No competitive examination would have any terror for such applicants. No, sir; if you would remove this unhealthy desire for governmental appointments from the minds of the young men throughout the country, from those who hold positions in the Departments, you must restore the equilibrium between prices paid by the Government and prices paid by citizens in the various callings and occupations of life. Then paid by citizens in the various callings and occupations of life. Then this unseemly and unhealthy desire for office would cease; then the employé of your Departments would hold his position by merit, and not by influence. The Government would need his services as much as he could need the place. He might have less money, but man does not live by money alone. He would hold his office by a more certain tenure, and would hold it without any loss of independence or manhood. Perhaps I am over nice on this point; but I had a hundred times rather a son of mine would earn his bread as a hired hand upon a farm than that he should cross the threshold of one of your Depart. a farm than that he should cross the threshold of one of your Departments to hold a position by any other influence than his own founded upon merit. Do not understand me as wishing to cast any reflection on the gentlemen holding positions in your Departments. I know many of them, and some of them are among the most intelligent gentlemen I have met in this city. But what I desire is, and all I desire is, that their lives shall not be harassed by anxiety and that they shall not be "pushed from their stools" by influence just when fitted and educated by experience here to be of the most service to their country. I want the tenure of their office to be as certain and as honorable as their merits. No one, sir, I believe is more willing to assist worthy citizens from his district than I am; and while you continue this system, while you hold up these salaries as wonderful prizes be fore the eyes of our young men, I presume that I with the rest shall insist that my district shall have its proportion. But why should we seek to maintain a system that consumes half the time of the Representative, and that wears out the very life of the applicant? I shall vote to reduce the salaries of the subordinate appointees of the Goverument with less regret, because I believe it will remove some of the worst evils of patronage; surely "a consummation devoutly to be

But, sir, I am still more anxious to reduce the salaries of the higher officers of the Government, and for stronger reasons. Most of these salaries have been raised to cover and meet inflation prices, and ought in all fairness to be reduced now that the real value of the dollar as a purchasing power has been nearly doubled.

These measures, however, commend themselves to my mind, not so much by the amount of money saved to the Treasury, as by the influence they will have upon society and upon the country. If Congress will reduce the salaries of its own members honestly and fairly, and will reduce the salaries of its own members honestly and fairly, and first, and will then reduce the salary of every other officer under the Government where it has the constitutional right to reach them, it will arrest the attention of the country, and will call a halt in that mad extravagance of expenditure that is leading so fast to public and private bankruptcy. But gentlemen say we must not reduce these salaries, because the present style of living will not allow it. That may be true; but unfortunately the style of living will increase in cost fastar than will salaries, no matter how often or how high they are raised. But six it is this very extravagance of style that every year raised. But, sir, it is this very extravagance of style that every year is driving thousands into bankruptey and hundreds into crime. Speculation and extravagance in expenditure have always been and always will be the natural and certain result of an inflated currency. But these influences have been greatly stimulated and aggravated by the example of those high in wealth and position.

One of the most discouraging features in our present depressed financial condition is that so many of our people are living beyond their income. The fictitious prosperity of inflation has led many of our people to be careless, and often reckless in expenditure. They felt no necessity to limit their expenditures to their incomes when the abundant supply of money made it so easy to discount all their golden dreams in generous credits. But, sir, when the inflated balloon in which we were all so merrily sailing collapsed, we found our generous credits turned into burdensome debts. Now a general reduction of salaries will arrest the attention of the country, and make it easier to return to a less expensive and more honest style of living.

We can have no public censor, as the Romans had, to keep the expenditures of our people within their incomes; we cannot by law control private expenditures, nor can we mark out by law the line that divides a generous and wise hospitality from a foolish and demoralizing extravagance. But while we cannot do this, we can by a wise limitation of salaries see to it that those in high positions do not lead in this foolish and demoralizing extravagance, but maintain the simple and better manners of the earlier days of the Republic, which are more in keeping with the character of our Government and the needs of our times.

There can be no doubt that such action on our part would meet with the grateful approval of the country; and, sir, a republic, no less than other forms of government, should rest on the affections of fully received by the people but would encourage and strengthen them for the duties now before them. There are two Herculean tasks that await the action of the American people that will demand all their wisdom and all their constancy. First, we must maintain the honor and credit of the Government by providing for a steady and gradual reduction of the national debt, and second, we must restore our currency to the standard of actual values as measured by specie. For it must never be forgotten that an inflated currency is the ever-fruitful source of this social extravagance that leads to so much ruin and, alas, to so much dishonor and crime. There is no safety but to return as speedily as possible to the honest money of the Constitution.

All the prosperity of inflation has proved a delusion and snare; all its flattering promises have turned to ashes in the grasp. On all sides we hear the complaint that business is paralyzed, capital is unemployed, labor is idle, enterprise is at a stand-still. Our opportunity and our duty are now one. Let us rebuild our prosperity on the solid rock of a sound currency, but to do this we must have the Government and the people in perfect sympathy.

Let us show to the people, what undoubtedly is the fact, that this Government can be administered at one-third less cost on specie values than it is possible to administer it under an inflated currency. Let us show them that we are ready to commence the reduction now on the strength of the promise already made of resumption in 1879. If we could have the same union of sentiment and action between the Government and the whole people that existed between the administration and the loyal States during the dark days of the war we could lead our currency steadily up to the specie standard hand in hand with the revival of every business interest of the country.

Then, sir, the Union re-united would commence its second century with a sound currency and enter upon a career of prosperity unknown and undreamed of before. As a means to this end, and as a policy which can only be justified by expecting these results, I shall vote for this bill under the limitations named and for all similar bills looking to a reduction of salaries.

Mr. JENKS. Mr. Chairman, by the permission of the Committee on Appropriations I shall, in the progress of the consideration of this bill, offer an amendment authorizing the transfer of the Pension B. reau of the United States from the Interior Department to the War Department, and I rise now for the purpose of explaining the provisions of that amendment and the proposed economy that would be accomplished by this transfer. It may be stated that probably three-fourths of a million of dollars can be saved by the transfer of this Bureau, and that its business can be done more intelligently, more diligently, and more purely than it is now. My purpose will be to state the facts to the House, and if I so show I shall expect to receive the support of those who believe that economy, diligence, and purity should characterize the administration of the Government.

But, Mr. Chairman, before I enter into the consideration of the transfer itself I desire to submit to the House some views in respect to certain allegations concerning the law, all important to those whom to certain allegations concerning the law, all important to those whom I as one have the honor especially to represent here. As the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and as members of that committee we feel it to be our duty to see that those who are committed to our charge shall not be wronged. As the conduct of all mankind depends somewhat on their abstract beliefs, it is necessary that those abstract beliefs, if they be flagrantly wrong, shall be rectified. The necessity for this occurred to me, and I suppose probably to every other person who has given it any attention at all, on the 1st day of March, some two weeks since. In the presence of this lst day of March, some two weeks since. In the presence of this House there was under consideration and discussion a certain bill concerning pensions. In that discussion I insisted that an invalid pension was a debt, a debt of the highest order, and one that no nation could refuse to pay, unless she stood distinctly on the ground of unequivocal repudiation. To demonstrate that fact will be my first labor in this discussion. I now assert that an invalid pension is a debt. In order to call the attention of the House to the discussion that occurred on that day. I said to the Clerk's desk to be read to that occurred on that day, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read remarks made by the honorable gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Kasson,] which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Again, the granting of these pensions now under consideration was an act of sovereign gratuity by the Government in recognition of the services supposed to have been rendered by the pensioners; and every pensioner is constantly at the discretion of his Government as to the amount of his compensation and as to the continuance of his pension.

Mr. JENKS. I ask the Clerk to read also from the remarks made by the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] the passage I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

First, sir, I desire gentlemen to consider here that there is not and cannot be any such thing as a vested right, a commercial transaction between the country and those who are the recipients of its bounty. Every nation has the right inherently to command the services of its citizens just whenever it calls for them, to call for their lives, to demand their money; and the measure of the citizen's duty is only limited by the necessities of the country. There is no contract of dollars and cents in that. So whoever may render service in a military capacity to the nation simply does his plain, unmistakable, undeniable duty, and whatever reward the nation may give him for having done that duty is in the line of free gift and grace, and not in the line of contract. And until this time I never heard any man talk of any such thing as a contract between the soldier and the nation giving him the right to a pension.

Mr. JENKS. I ask the Clerk also to read from the remarks of the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. Townsend] the passage I

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Now the committee that matured this bill was the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of 1812. We matured a bill relating wholly to the pensioners of the war of 1812. We brought that bill into this House, and if it had been left in its application to the pensioners of the war of 1812 I should feel I was doing here, as I felt I was doing in the committee, my duty to the pensioners and the country in sustaining that bill. But not upon the ground that the pensioner has the right with the muzzle of a pistol to demand of the country a pension. Good God! are we to have that doctrine presented here or anywhere else that a pensioner has the right to make such a demand of the country? Not at all. It is not upon any such ground. It was upon the ground that these men had rendered efficient service, and it became the country to be liberal to them in turn. The service was all rendered before the pension was granted.

Mr. JENKS. From these extracts it will be seen that three gentlemen of experience, learned in the law, and for whom personally and as lawyers I should have the highest respect, have asserted that au invalid pension is not a debt; that it may be granted or withheld at the pleasure of the Government; that there is no obligation to pay it; that it is simply a gratuity. Now, if it be a gratuity, we may at any moment cut off these pensions; we may refuse to pay them from any moment that it may occur to the legislative branch of the Government that it is for the interest of the Government so to do. If that be so it is a most fatal truth for these pensioners who have been deprived of their limbs in the cause of their country.

Now, in order to refute what seems to me to be a most flagrant fallacy, I propose to discuss the question at this time, because, first, I think the Pension Bureau, which we seek to transfer, has been laboring under the same fallacy, has been of the opinion that they may grant or refuse a pension as they see proper, that they may expedite it or delay it as to them may seem convenient, that they may grant it to a political friend or deny it to a political opponent as may seem best for party purposes. It is to refute this view, and that the péople may comprehend what is a right and what is a gift, that I propose now to discuss this as the first question in this bill.

A contract, as we are led to suppose from our early legal lucubrations, is an agreement for a sufficient consideration to do or not to do some given thing; a promise for a consideration, an offer for a consideration accepted. This constitutes a contract as differently expressed by different authors. Now, if the Government before the soldier entered the Army told that soldier that if he should enter and become disabled he should be paid a pension, that would be a contract, if the soldier entered the Army and was disabled. I apprehend that cannot be disputed.

First, in 1776, before the revolutionary war had made its crippled and disabled soldiers, there was a resolution passed in the Continental Congress which to be sure might not be binding as a law, but is certainly binding in good faith. I read from Mr. Ruff's Pension Man-

The Continental Congress by a series of resolutions passed August 26, 1776, provided that every commissioned and non-commissioned officer and private in the Army who should lose a limb in any engagement, or be otherwise so disabled in the service of the States, in the war then existing with the mother country, as to be rendered incapable "afterward of gaining a livelihood," should receive during life, or the continuance of such disability, one-half his monthly pay after his pay as a soldier should coses. dier should cease

Hence, before the revolutionary war had made its cripples, there was a promise by the Government to those who were disabled in the cause of liberty that they should receive a pension. If that promise cause of liberty that they should receive a pension. If that promise is binding upon the nation after they were organized under the present Constitution, it is a contract as to these soldiers. We will see now whether that was ratified by the United States. In 1790, after the organization of the Government, the Congress of the United States passed an act, approved April 30, 1790, "for the regulation and formation of the armies of the United States." That act provided—

That if any commissioned officer, non-commissioned officer, private, or musician aforesaid shall be wounded or disabled while in the line of his duty in public service, he shall be placed on the list of invalids of the United States at such rate of pay and under such regulations as shall be directed by the President of the United States for the time being.

That was in 1790. Thus at that time the resolution of the Con-That was in 1790. Thus at that time the resolution of the Continental Congress was ratified in the passage of the general Army bill, and it was promised that any one disabled in the line of his duty as a soldier should be paid a pension. If that promise was accepted by the soldier and he was disabled, was it not a contract and has he not a right to demand his pension?

In order that there never should be any misapprehension on this subject and that every well-informed man should know his rights, prior that the properties a similar resolution or law ject and that every well-informed man should know his rights, prior to every war, with very few exceptions, a similar resolution or law has been enacted. Such re-enactment took place before or in the early stages of every great war. In anticipation of the war of 1812 with Great Britain, and for the very purpose of inducing enlistments, there was passed an act approved January 11, 1812, entitled "An act to raise an additional military force." It provided—

That if any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private shall be disabled by wounds or otherwise while in the line of his duty in public service, he shall be placed on the list of invalids of the United States at such rate of pension and under such regulations as are or may be directed by law, &c.

So that we find that prior to the Revolution an act of this kind was passed and prior to the war of 1812 it was reiterated. But it may be pleaded that the statute of limitations applies as to all these Since 1865 many statutes of limitations have been passed depriving pensioned soldiers of their rights. It has been assumed repeatthis House that these soldiers are not entitled as of right to pensions; that these are a mere gratuity. At a proper time we will consider whether these limitation acts ought to stand upon the statute-books or whether they are a disgrace to our legislation. time I will say nothing more about them. But I assert here broadly that with very few exceptions the rule is that every invalid pension is a debt, and a debt the nation ought not to repudiate.

In 1862 it became necessary, as was supposed, to reiterate the same legislation. Hence we find that on the 14th of July, 1862, an enactment of this kind was passed, which is to be found in the Statutes at Large, volume 12, page 556. Although this principle had been as-serted frequently and broadly in many enactments and re-enactments, it was the intention of the Government that this matter should be placed beyond doubt. It was intended that no soldier in the Army should doubt or hesitate for a moment in the belief that if he were disabled in his country's service he should not be consigned for the disabled in his country's service he should not be consigned for the residue of his days to penury and pauperism, or in case of death his surviving family subjected to the same fate. This provision was enacted in order that he might feel at ease; that he might rest in the confident belief that if he sacrificed his all for his country, that country would provide for those whom he left behind. Hence in 1862, before very many invalid pensioners had been made, this act was

That if any officer, non-commissioned officer, musicians, or private of the Army, including regulars, volunteers, and militia, or any warrant officer or petit officer, musician, seaman, ordinary seaman, flotilla man, marine, clerk, landsman, pilot, or other person in the Navy or Marine Corps, has been since the 4th day of March, 1861, or shall hereafter be, disabled by reason of any wound or disease contracted while in the service of the United States in the line of duty, he shall, upon making due proof of the fact according to such forms and regulations as are or may be provided for by or in pursuance of law, be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States.

This act was to a large degree prospective. The great mass of those who are now pensioners were then able-bodied men. Under the provisions of this act they stepped into the ranks. They had the assurance of the country whose honor they had always regarded as holy and sacred that if they were disabled or should die in the service of their country they and theirs should be provided for.

Mr. HURLBUT. What is the date of the act which the gentleman has just read?

Mr. JENKS. July 14, 1862; prior certainly to the time when the great mass of our pensioners had become such.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If the gentleman will allow me, I would have a such as the properties of President Lincoln, issued in remind him that in the proclamation of President Lincoln, issued in 1861, calling for volunteers, a promise was made that such as might be wounded or should contract disease in the war should have a pension; and Congress afterward ratified that promise.

Mr. JENKS. The facts are as the honorable gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hewitt] states them. The pension law of 1862 was not passed before the first soldier went into the Army; yet prior to that time the soldiers had the word of a man they had reason to trust that if they should go into the service they should be provided for. Shall that word be disgraced here on the floor of this Congress? Shall we disregard that contract in view of which they went into the Army? They obeyed the call of their country; and in that view they did only their duty, it is true, as the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] has said; but it was a duty the performance of which was dangerous, and it was performed under the promise that this provision would be made. Dare we repudiate that promise and say that it is not a contract? Shall we say to a man who asks for a say that it is not a contract? Shall we say to a man who asks for a pension, "You are the acceptor of a gratuity; you are a mendicant; we can grant you this or refuse it at our option, and no one can charge us with injustice?" In the name of the 200,000 invalid pensioners of the United States, I repudiate this doctrine. If their pension certificates are to be regarded as badges of medicancy, they would spurn them from them and hurl them in your face.

They are their right; and when I sit it, my committee adjudicating

They are their right; and when I sit in my committee adjudicating whether a pensioner be entitled to a pension or not, I do it upon the principle that the claimant comes there asking for his legal right, and I am bound to grant it if he brings himself within the provisions of the law. Hence I hope it may never be again asserted on the floor of this House, and more particularly by what would seem to be con-certed action, for no sooner was it asserted by one than it was followed by others, that it was not a debt.

One of the honorable gentlemen assigns as a reason that he had never heard of such a thing. The fact that he had never heard of such a thing was no argument why it did not exist, because if we were such a thing was no argument why it did not exist, because if we were to test the existence of what is true by what any man knows, the truth on earth or in the universe would be extremely limited.

Another reason assigned was that they only did their duty. That is true. They did their duty, and when the Government promised them this if they did their duty, are they not entitled to it? A man may only do his duty when he performs his daily labor for his employer; he is only doing his duty, but is not his employer under obligation to pay him? The fact that he is doing his duty is no argument against it; and we insist an invalid pension is a debt and should be so recognized by the Government, and in the organization of courts for the adjudication of such claims we should take the same care as in the organization of any other court in the United States. If this business is not fairly and honestly done, diligently and economic ally done, where it is performed now, then let us place it where it will be.

So much for this question which has consumed more time than I intended. I will pass now to the consideration of the main question before the House, and in order that it may be fully comprehended, I will send up the bill and ask the Clerk to read it as part of my remarks. It is introduced as an amendment to the bill under consideration by the courtesy of the Committee on Appropriations. It is House bill No. 2590, transferring the Bureau of Pensions from the Interior Department to the War Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That from and after July 1, 1877, the Pension Bureau of the United States, with all its duties, funds, accounts, claims, records, books, papers, property, and appurtenances, shall be transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Department of War.

Sec. 2. That the Secretary of War shall exercise all the powers and discharge all the duties heretofore exercised and performed by the Secretary of the Interior in relation to pensioners and the Pension Bureau; and all accounts shall be subject to adjustment by the officers of the Treasury now having charge of the department of accounts of said Bureau and the pension agents and agencies.

Sec. 3. That on and after the date aforesaid, there is hereby established in the War Department an office to be known as the Pension Office; and the Secretary of War shall detail from the commissioned officers of the Army an officer to take charge of said office, and administer its affairs under regulations to be made and promulgated by the Secretary of War; the officers of otaled shall, for the time he may be detailed to the charge of the Pension Office, have the pay and allowances of a colonel, and shall perform all the duties now performed by the Commissioner of Pensions.

may be detailed to the charge of the Pension Office, have the pay and anomaces of a colonel, and shall perform all the duties now performed by the Commissioner of Pensions.

SEC. 4 That on and after the date aforesaid, the office of pension agent and pension agencies for the disbursement of the pension fund shall be abolished and discontinued; and on and after the payment of the quarterly payment due pensioners on the 4th day of June, 1877, all funds remaining in their hands shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 5. That the duties heretofore performed by the pension agents and agencies shall be performed under the direction of the Secretary of War by the Pay Department of the Army; and the Secretary of War is authorized to detail such additional force of commissioned officers as may, through knowledge and experience of disbursing duties, be suited and necessary to perform such duties; the officers so detailed to give bond in such sum as shall be approved by the Secretary of War for the faithful discharge of their duties.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to re-organize and re-adjust the several divisions of the Pension Bureau, and detail officers and employés to do the work in such manner as shall conduce to the good of the service. Any officer authorized to investigate any suspected attempts to defraud the United States in or affecting the administration of any law relative to pensions, and to aid in prosecuting any person implicated, shall have the power to administer oaths in the course of any such investigation.

SEC. 7. That the details of commissioned officers under sections 5 and 6 of this act may be extended to officers on the retired list of the Army; and such officers while so serving shall have the pay and allowances of officers of like grade on the active list.

SEC. 8. That on or before the 1st day of July, 1877, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause the Pension Bureau in all its parts and duties to be in full readiness for the transfer mentioned in s

Mr. JENKS. The provisions of this act as a rule are general in their terms without going into detail of administration of the Office. It was thought expedient, and it seems also wise, to leave the working out of the details, after the general plan shall have been laid. to administration.

The bill has been drawn on that principle, and with the exception of the seventh section and the fourth and fifth sections, which I will consider in the course of my remarks, I need only say that it provides for the removal of the Pension Bureau and the conduct of it in the War Department.

The seventh section, which is new in its character, provides that those in the half-pay service of the Government may be employed in the duties of that Office. It gives the means by which many now paid by the Government may be utilized. There can now be employed in this Pension Office if transferred to the Army, the half-pay officers from the grade of captain down, and one-half, at least, of all that is now paid out in carrying on the Pension Office will be saved in this way, while it will afford employment to those who are now unfit for way, while it will afford employment to those who are now until the field duty and are now on the half-pay list of the Government. The amount thereby saved will be one-half of what is now paid to the employés in this Office. To whatever extent those half-pay officers may be able to do the work of the Office, and it is claimed they may be able to do it to a large extent, of the three hundred necessary they will at least supply the place of one hundred and fifty, leaving to be paid one hundred and fifty full-paid pension officers. It would reduce the force substantially one hundred and fifty in that particular and afford employment to those now in the half-pay service of the Gov-

The third and fourth sections of the bill, for doing away with pension agents, I will dispose of as we go along. These pension agencies seem to be one of the most flagrant excesses of our Government.

In the consideration of this subject I will call the attention of the House to what may seem rather a platitude at first glance. There are general principles so obvious they seem to have lost all their value from their mere all-pervading abundance, just as the sunlight in all its beauty and sublimity is forgotten in its magnificent beneficence, from its mere exuberance. With reference to this Bureau it seems to me some of the plainest principles of our Government have been forme some of the plainest principles of our Government have been forgotten. In our form of government the people inherit their rights, and directly or indirectly grant to the Government its powers. They are the principals; it is the agent. They are the creators; it is the creature. Under certain powers of attorney, if I may so style them, known as constitutions, State and national, they grant certain powers.

to others to act for them. These constitutions, so far as they grant the powers, authorize those acting for the people to do certain duties, when the persons to whom the powers are granted have been qualiwhen the persons to whom the powers are granted have been quantified in a given way. But anything that is not within these grants is an assumption wrongful and flagrant.

The Army, the Navy, the Territories, and the treasures belong to the people. If anything be left without an owner it is subject to the the people. If anything be left without an owner it is subject to the common-law right of occupancy; and that instinct pervades almost the whole human race, that if a thing be lying open without an owner any person coming along may occupy it and have a good title to it. Now, with reference to this, it seems as if the people are entirely forgotten, and as if the territory of the Government, to a great extent, and its treasures are presumed by those in power in this Bureau to be open to general occupancy, and that they can acquire title to anything they can lay hands upon, because they have forgotten the people have any definite ownership. This principle vindicates itself in that the employés of a corporation do not conceive so clearly of the privilege of ownership existing in it, and take from it more freely than they would from a private individual. In a great Government we find persons doing deeds and committing crimes against the Government in the way of appropriating property and moneys which they would never think of doing if they were in the employment of an individual.

Now, the first fact I want to have understood in reference to this Bureau, and I may say everywhere else, is, that there is an ownership as to the property of the National Government; that her treasures are her own, and not open to general occupancy at all. And I fear this principle has been violated by this Bureau, as I shall be able to show as I proceed. In order that the business of the Government may be done with facility it is divided into certain Departments. Those Departments in themselves have no rights to any particular parties of the public territory or the public treasure. It is only in proportion as the work can be best attended to that it should be assigned to any particular Department or Bureau. Now, if the Department of War can do this duty which we propose to assign to it with greater intelligence, greater economy, greater diligence, and greater purity than where it is now, it ought to be removed there. And we propose to show that the business can be done more intelligently, more economically, more diligently, and more purely by this transfer of the Bureau.

On this point I ask the attention of the whole House. We have en-On this point I ask the attention of the whole House. We have endeavored to obviate any possibility of party opposition by fixing that the transfer does not occur until 1877. In 1877 no one can tell whether the Administration will be democratic or republican. This may hit the one party or it may hit the other. But if it is right, I ask that it shall be done. We fixed the date of the transfer in 1877 that it might have the candid consideration of every member of this House. And I ask you to join in effecting this transfer if to you it seems right. If it does not seem right, and it is not right, I am just as sincere in the desire that you shall not do it as any man in this House. But to me desire that you shall not do it as any man in this House. But to me it seems it should be done.

Let me show how this Bureau came first to be placed in the Department of the Interior. In 1849 it had been concluded to organize a new Department to be known as the Department of the Interior. Duties were assigned to that Department. This pension duty was one. At that time it was comparatively trifling; and when a man has a small work to do he is not apt to consider very carefully whether he is to have it done in the most economical way or not; but if the work becomes vast in its proportions, then it is of importance that he should have it done in the most economical way. Hence this Bureau being small at the time, was assigned as a mere fragment to make work for the Interior Department. But this state of things does not now exist. This Bureau has become an important department. It has an expenditure of $29,000,000. It provides for the payment of 234,000 pensioners. An army of men stands behind its awards. They receive their daily bread in many instances from it. What was then transferred has become great. What was then an insignificant labor has swelled in its dimensions until it is immense; and while it is a has swelled in its dimensions until it is liminense; and while it is a great burden it is also a great honor to our country; and on the other hand it is a great shame if we do not see that it is honestly and well administered. It was assigned to the Interior Department only for the purpose of making work for the new Department without any particular reason why that assignment should be made. Now the labor has increased; and if it naturally belongs to the War Department and the labor can be greatly reduced by transferring it there, it is our duty to make that transfer.

Now what are the duties of the Pension Office? What does it do?

Now, what are the duties of the Pension Office? What does it do? In the first place, it adjudicates or determines the right of certain persons to certain funds of the Government; it determines the question of a debt between the soldier and the Government, and also determines the propriety of granting gratuities in some instances, and after that is done it pays out the debts and gratuities. A great proportion of the labor of the Office is that involved in the adjudication as to who are entitled to pensions. The great work is the granting

Now, in granting pension certificates what questions arise? The first is, was the man claiming a pension regularly mustered; was he wounded in the service in the line of his duty; was he regularly discharged? Is the applicant the man who was thus mustered; who was thus wounded in the line of his duty and discharged? One question to be decided is that of personal identity. The question whether a man was wounded in the line of duty is a military question; the question of his discharge is a military one. As a rule, the only one that arises in the case that is not a military question is that of the personal identity of the party, except certain medical questions, which may be either military or civil. We all know the difference in value between an unskilled laborer who gets from four to six dollars a month and a skilled laborer who gets three or four dollars a day. The soldier is the skilled, the civilian the unskilled laborer. A word which would be in a civilian's vocabulary an exotic is to the military man a household word; a question being military, he can decide it at once. The question, then, is whether this business can or cannot be discharged more intelligently and more quickly when done by skilled instead of unskilled labor.

There is another thing to which I desire to call the attention of the committee. Between the 4th of March, 1875, and the 3d of February, 1876, one hundred and twenty-eight employés of the Office have been discharged and ninety-six new appointments made. man should be permitted to remain in the Office until he acquired experience, that system might work, but where it is a political office this cannot be done. Every time there is a change of political parties it is probable a large proportion of the skilled labor will be removed and unskilled labor substituted. In a court of justice it would never be entertained for a moment to permit a man unlearned in the law to sit upon the bench except in trivial cases; we always require that a legal question shall be decided by those learned in the law. Now why not apply the same rule to military questions in this case? Is that court whose awards annually disburse $29,000,000 too insignificant to justify the employment of skilled labor † It would be more intelligently done. It would also be more economically done.

With reference to economy, among the greatest sinecures that ever overspread the country are the offices of pension agents. Twenty men added to the Pay Department of the Army might do the whole work, whereas there are now fifty-eight pension agents at a cost to the Government of over $426,000. About 214,000 vouchers are filled and mailed quarterly to the pensioners; one man can fill 12,000 vonchers quarterly; multiply that by twenty, it will amount to $240,000, and that is more than is required to be done, for which the Government now pays, including contingencies, over $448,000.

These pension agents, some of them, draw salaries and contingencies of over $15,000 a year. Their average salary and contingent is $7,767, or about that. The amount of their labor may be illustrated by a statement I received from a clerk of one of these officers to where character for vergeity a member of this House is ready to to whose character for veracity a member of this House is ready to certify. He states that with a salary of $900 he did all the work that was done at one of these agencies except signing the checks, which the pension agent himself might do in twenty minutes a day, and for signing the checks the agent received over $6,600 annually.

Another agent in an adjoining city, after paying all expenses for rent, fuel, &c., received $84,800 of clear money. There are fifty-eight of these men, and their average salary is over $7,000 and odd. All the expenses of the Bureau and agencies and the expense to the Government is over 4 per cent., and it could probably be done for 1 per cent. It certainly can be done for half a million less, or probably three-features of a million less, or probably three-features of a million less.

These agents are scattered like the roots of a mighty cancer all over the land; they are eating out the vitals of the country; they are planted everywhere, and you will scarcely find a congressional district from which the influence of some such officer does not come; and if his stipend be decreased, he will go to the polls and cut off their votes and defeat the member who has the manhood to attack them. These agents can well afford to spend something for political purposes or to prevent or defeat any act that might be pending. In 1874 an attempt was made by a reforming Congress that seemed to be seized with a temporary spasm of reform to cut off this allowance of thirty cents for each voucher. It was attempted to cut off the payment of this fee at a time when they were costing the Government about $114,000. The agents came swarming here, made a compromise with that Conto cut off five cents, leaving twenty-five cents still. What a fearful reform that was!

We ask something more radical; we ask that they shall be cut up by the roots, $4,000 and all, and that twenty men shall do what now costs so much. For that purpose I have introduced this transfer as a part of the appropriation bill, as a retrenchment measure. We say that not only can it be done more economically in this respect, but there is another aspect of the case to be considered.

There are made upon the War Office and the Surgeon-General's Office each year by the Pension Bureau 56,000 calls for evidence. More than half the work of this Pension Bureau in the adjudication of pension cases is dependent upon the War Office and the Surgeon-General's Office for evidence. Any one who takes up a claim and examines it, can see in a very short time where the evidence comes from and what it is to be decided upon.

This Pension Bureau, located some quarter of a mile distant, sends fifty-six thousand written calls for evidence to the War Office, or the Surgeon-General's Office. It is easier to ask questions than to answer them. This takes time, besides the writing of one hundred and twelve thousand letters, to transmit the letters backward and forward and to look up the evidence. The greater part of the work done in the adjudication of these pension cases is at this time probably done in the War Office and the Surgeon-General's Office.

The Surgeon-General's Office has but sixty-one employés on this work, and the War Office has but fifty-five, making one hundred and sixteen employés in both Offices. The Pension Bureau has three hundred and ninety-three employes. If you should go down there to-day with a pension claim and ask why they do not act upon it, their response will be, "We are waiting for evidence from the War Office, or the Surgeon-General's Office." That is, three hundred and ninety-three men in the Pension Bureau are made to wait on one hundred and sixteen men in the other two Offices. Now, what well-informed economist would permit such a state of things as that? Would he not put them both under the same head and say that whenever there is any waiting there shall be a redistribution of force, so that each Office should have its proportionate share of workmen? I apprehend the War Office and the Surgeon-General's Office have too small a number of employés for this work. In my judgment there should be an increase of force in the Surgeon-General's Office, sufficient at least to bring up this business.

Here is another thing in reference to this matter. If these officers and employés were in the same Department there would be saved a great deal of unnecessary labor of this kind. For instance, I have here the case of Henry Kilbourn, No. 181643. In this case there were three requisitions for substantially the same evidence, or at least what one single request might have obtained. This case came to my attention casually; I was not looking for it at all; but it came before me in my duties on the committee. In this case the Pension Bureau sent three times for substantially the same evidence. How did that occur? Probably just in this way: Some man writes to inquire why the claim has not been disposed of. It is easier to sit down and fill a blank calling for more evidence than it would be to examine the records and see if the claim was in order for adjudication or not. So the blank is filled, and the additional copy of the roll and hospital record

Now, if this was an isolated case, it is not likely I would have come across it among the few cases that came before me. I went to the Surgeon-General's Office and asked how many such applications in one year were made of that Office. I received in writing the reply that there had been more than thirty-eight hundred, or about 21 per cent. Now, if they were all in the same Department, this would be avoided. There were over thirty-eight hundred applications for evidence made of the Surgeon General's Office. Of the War Office there were many more. Probably in both there were ten thousand cases where applications were made for new evidence, in cases where they already had evidence on record. Therefore, in this respect, we see that this work would be more diligently done if this transfer should be made.

Another instance of lack of diligence. This seems to me to be an instance of flagrant wrong. If it was an isolated instance I would not so strongly insist upon it. But it is in the interest of common honesty and decency that I ask the House to consider another case which I have here. It is the case of John Murphy. The charge made was something like this: That the Pension Bureau, lest it should run out of work, was in the habit of granting a pension below the grade to which the applicant was entitled, in order to compel him to make another application, and thus there would be more cases for the Office to work upon, and thereby the Pension Bureau would be able to keep to work upon, and thereby the Pension Bureau would be able to keep its full force. That was the charge.

I inquired a little into this case of John Murphy, which it was claimed was one among many of the kind. I refer to this only as an illustration. I have not been able to find to what extent this practice exists; but it exists to some extent, whether with the intent alleged I cannot say. In this case of John Murphy, No. 105481, the man was blind. He sent in his application to the Pension Bureau in 1867. The action of the Bureau was this contaments. man was blind. He sent in his application to the Pension Bureau in 1867. The action of the Bureau was this: September 15, 1870, he was granted a pension of $15 per month. Prior to that the surgeon's certificate, dated July 28, 1868, is, "Surgeon Randall reports disability total." That is, at the time the pension was granted the surgeon had reported to the Office that the applicant was totally disabled. On the day the pension was granted it seems the man was totally disabled; he was blind, wandering about sightless and in darkness. Very soon after the pension of $15 a month was granted he receives notice from his attorney to apply for an increase, and he does apply accordfrom his attorney to apply for an increase, and he does apply accordingly; and on the 15th of December, 1870, the grade "total" was again returned. His certificate is then increased in amount to $20 per month January 11, 1871. But this is not yet the final consummation by any means. It is necessary to call the matter up again, and require this poor blind man again to seek his evidence in darkness. He applies for another increase, and the return "total" is again made. He gets notice to go and apply for an increase; and he gets it every time. His pension is then raised to $24 per month. That is on the 4th day of June, 1872. First it is $15, then $20, and then $24.

Now, you would conclude that they had done with this man; that the subject was about exhausted. But no, gentlemen, they were not done by a great deal. They had only just commenced. They then sent out some detective or some other officer of the service; a by some means they reduced his grade. We find that on the 14th of November, 1873, his pension was reduced to $18 per month. Thus they took another twist at this poor blind man. You might suppose that this was the end of the matter. But it is not. They increase the pension again to $24 per month. In accordance with a notice dated January 5, 1876, his pension is increased to $24, commencing September 1, 1875. Thus we see the number of different changes in this pension from the time of its granting.

Now, Mr. Chairman, ought this thing to be tolerated? Ought an office that performs its work no more diligently and honestly than this be permitted to exist under a Government of American freemen who claim to be honest? I say that something ought to be done; and I have felt it my duty as chairman of the committee to bring the matter to the attention of this House and ask action upon it.

But the business is done negligently in another way. For instance, if you look at the report of the Third Auditor of the Treasury you will find that the amount of money disbursed by this Department to Army pensioners is returned on page 17 as $29,171,179. You would expect that the return of the Pension Bureau would correspond with that. But it does not. If you look at the return of the Commissioner of Pensions you find that the amount paid to Army pensioners is returned as $29,162,768. It will be seen that there is a discrepancy of something over $8,000 in the figures. I do not charge that this is the result of fraud; because I do not intend to charge anything that I am not fully assured of. It may be fraud; it may be negligence. Charitysays, call it negligence; and I am disposed to do so. But negligence of this kind in business matters requires reprobation; and I ask that this House shall award to this Bureau that reprobation which it seems to deserve in this connection.

Let me give you another illustration of a similar character. If you employed an agent who was responsible for the disbursement of a large amount of money, say thirty or forty million dollars, you would expect the accounts to be kept so that you could tell just where each dollar went. The larger the amount to be disbursed the more you would insist upon strict accuracy in its disbursement and in the keeping of the accounts. Now, in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions there is an item of $2,855,189 disposed of in one single lump and in such a manner that no living man can tell where it has gone, except on his mere ipse dixit, without going over every pension claim paid within the year.

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague [Mr. Jenks] be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKS. In explanation of the item I have just referred to, the Commissioner, in an official communication, makes the following statement:

The difference between the annual amount of the roll, $26,289.519.59, and the amount disbursed, $29,683,116.63, is $3,393,597.04, which is thus explained:

H. M. ATKINSON, Commissioner.

Hon. GEORGE A. JENKS, House of Representatives.

In other words, there is an item of $2,855,189.18, which you cannot find any account of in any book without going over every claim that has been paid. Now I do not call this fraud; there may be fraud in it; but I do not know it; and I do not propose to assert it. But I do sert that there is negligence in it, negligence of the most flagrant character, that demands attention at our hands. I might extend these illustrations of negligence almost beyond limit.

But there is something even worse than this. There has been a But there is something even worse than this. There has been a steady growth in the expenses of this Bureau from the time it did its most efficient work until the present time. For instance, in 1866 this Bureau granted about fifty thousand original pensions. In that year the Bureau, from the best information I can get, was working honestly and well. Last year it granted what would be equivalent to 12,800 or 13,000 original pensions. In saying "equivalent" I mean this: An increased-pension claim is not so laborious to adjudicate as an original claim. From the best information I can get, a person an original claim. From the best information I can get, a person can adjudicate from eight to fifteen increased claims to each original claim. I take the lowest-estimate and divide the number of increased claims by eight; adding the result to the number of original claims, the amount is 12,800 adjudicated this year.

The number of clerks employed this year was four hundred and twenty, that is during the year ending 30th of June, 1875. The number of clerks employed in 1866, when fifty thousand claims were adjudicated, was one hundred and seventy-five. That is, the labor has diminished in inverse ratio, and the force has increased proportionally. This being so would need explanation. It is capable of some explanation in this way, that the claim to be adjudicated as you get further away from the time of the occurrence of an event causes more labor because it takes more evidence to do the work. You have to call two witnesses to prove a fact when at an earlier time perhaps one would do. That will explain some portion, but not one-fifth or one-tenth of the discrepancy, so that we must conclude there is a great deal of waste of labor in this Bureau. I called the chief clerk, and inquired of what use was the finance department consisting of forty-eight, and he said that if the Third Auditor of the Treasury was up with his work there would be no necessity for continuing it.

Now, there are barnacles fastened on this machine all over. It has been used as the place in which the politician might put his protégés when they came here after he had been elected to Congress. This is all wrong, and should be obviated by this Congress

But there is another view than this. I wish to call the attention of the House to the appropriations for different years. There has been a steady increase in the expenses of this Department in this wise: The appropriation of 2d of March, 1865, for this Bureau was $237,920; onthe 23d of July, 1866, it was $236,340, and on March 2, 1867, it was on the 23d of July, 1866, it was $236,340, and on March 2, 1867, it was $257,920. It still goes up from this on, as a rule. The next year there was a presidential election, and if you were looking out right sharp for things you might expect for that year the appropriation would be increased, and in that expectation you would not be disappointed. The next year the appropriation for this Bureau was $349,240, an increase of nearly $100,000! That may have no significance, and it may have a good deal. I am saying this not for any purpose to attack the republican party, but to attack its extension as a political office, and to maintain the principle that this is an office which should not be to maintain the principle that this is an office which should not be used for political purposes either by the republican or democratic party. If it is so used, then let us withdraw it as soon as possible from any such temptation at least.

The appropriation for this Bureau continued to increase until for the last year it amounted to $529,580. This constant increase of ap-propriation requires consideration at our hands. When there is less work done there are more employes, and with an appropriation more than doubled, is it not the duty of the House to inquire whether this Bureau is where it should be or not? I ask you to consider it honestly as men, and not as politicians.

There is another feature to which I wish to call the attention of the House, which seems to me to be a most flagrant violation of law by this Bureau. The indications so far have been cases of negligence, but what I am now coming to is fraud—nothing more and nothing less than embezzlement under the statute—and that is the misappropriation and diversion of a public fund from the purpose for which it was granted to another and different purpose. John Stiles was called before the Committee of Invalid Pensions and testified that he had been employed in the service of the republican congressional committee that the purpose is the proposed for the committee of the republican congressional committee. mittee during the summer and had been paid out of the pension fund. This substantially was his evidence. Mr. Atkinson, the Commissioner of Pensions, testified that William Caffrey and others who had been employed by the republican congressional committee had also been paid out of the invalid-pension fund. This is diverting a public fund from the purpose for which it was appropriated, and the statute says from the purpose for which it was appropriated, and the statute says this shall be visited with punishment of not less than one year in the penitentiary. But this is not the worst of it. If this were all, and there were nothing more, it might be passed over on the principle deminimus in law. But it is a custom, and is proved to be a custom by the late Courmissioner of Pensions himself. In his testimony, page 8, he stated that he understood from all parties that this was the custom—that he did it on that principle. Embezzlement a custom! A crime visited with penal servitude of one year in the penitentiary become a custom! The people groaning under the burden of taxation and diversion of a public fund from its proper purpose for party purposes! If this be a custom, is it not our duty to see that that custom poses! If this be a custom, is it not our duty to see that that custom shall cease? It has become so customary indeed that the party who gave the testimony scarcely conceived that he had done any wrong. He has been guilty of an act, it is true, which at law amounted to embezzlement, and yet did not in his testimony seem to be aware that he had perpetrated any wrong. It is an outrage that ought not to be longer tolerated. I now send up to the Clerk to be read a letter which came before me casually, showing the necessity in this Office that the officers paid out of its fund shall do only the work of the office.

The Clerk read as follows:

FULTON, OSAGE COUNTY, NEW YORK, September 26, 1875.

Fulton, Osage County, New York, September 26, 1875.

Dear Sir: Yours of September 22, 1875, is received, together with letter and blanks from the Commissioner's Office at Washington.

Now in regard to these blanks, that is for proof of marriage, and medical testimony, showing the date and cause of the soldier's death, his condition from time of his discharge, and the origin of his disease; they have all been filled out according to request and sent, and most of them two or three times over; and why this poor widow should be compelled to go to all of this extra trouble and expense to furnish it all over again I am certainly at a loss to conceive.

This seems to be truly a hard case. The soldier was sick and blind for years, which fact has been repeatedly shown to the pension officers, and the fact was at the same time shown that his ailments were brought on by his services in the Army, and so acknowledged by the Pension Department; and while in this condition he had to be cyried about from nearly one end of the State to the other repeatedly to obtain the testimony necessary to establish his claim, so that he might get something to enable him to procure proper medical aid and food and raiment to subsist upon. And the Pension Office acknowledged the receipt of his papers, and that they were correct, and that his claim was just. But they have still withheld his pension and allowed him to barely subsist upon town support and the charity of the neighbors, and, lastly, to die from actual want of proper medical attendance and the common necessaries of life. And now his widow asks for the portion the law allows her, and has sent all of the proofs necessary to establish her claim, and that too at considerable expense and trouble; and she has no more than sent them before she is required to furnish the same right over again, word for word. She has endured in this matter in the way of trouble and expense all furnish the exact same proofs which she has already furnished; and if she were able, I cannot see for the life of me me that the Commissioner should at once either tell her that there is nothing for her—that is, that the Government is ungrateful for the services of her soldiers—or at once allow her claim and pay it. These few remarks, my dear sir, are submitted in kindness and without any intentional disrespect.

And now will you have the kindness to present this matter at Washington in its true light, and as soon as possible transmit to me the results?

Respectfully, yours, &c.,

J. D. BROWN,

WILLIAM E. PRESTON.

Mr. JENKS. The widow pleads her cause while the fund that is provided by law to pay the officers of the court to grant her relief is appropriated by custom for party purposes. In the early winter, in one of the dailies, my eye caught an item somewhat like this: "The one of the dailies, my eye caught an item somewhat like this: "The attention of a policeman this morning was attracted by the wailing of a child in a dilapidated tenement, to which he went, and upon the floor sat a sobbing child about eighteen months old, cold, and alone by the side of its dead mother. A post moviem examination developed the fact that she had no food in her stomach. She had died of starvation." Perhaps she was the wife of one of the boys in blue who attested his patriotism by his life's blood. If she was not, hundreds and perhaps thousands of parallels are awaiting the action of this tribunal.

on the street-corners the cripple stands and holds out the hat; he must beg or die. While he stands begging, around the fund a grateful nation has provided for his relief every obscene bird of corruption gathers. Shall this continue? Common decency demands it shall cease. If embezzlement must exist as a custom, (which God forbid,) let it fasten upon some other fund than this. This is the poor remuneration of the deceased, the pay of the mutilated soldier, the price of the blood of patriot heroes, "whose blood, so holy is it, would not stain the purest rill that sparkles among the bowers of bliss." Let the vile hands of corruption at least refrain from its pollution. May that which a nation's faith and gratitude have appropriated to the perfect purpose reach the worthy claimants of the nation's instands.

beneficent purpose reach the worthy claimants of the nation's justice and bounty undelayed, undiminished. By a transfer to the War Office this political defilement would be avoided.

Another suggestion is not unworthy of consideration. From the very nature of our institutions a large standing Army is obnoxious, and yet, until that period shall arrive at which every man will be a law unto himself, an Army is necessary. We, with propriety, maintain a Military Academy to educate the officers. These educated officers should not be lost to the nation. Employment should be provided for them; so that our Army, which in time of peace should only be a nucleus, should have a frame-work of skilled commanders, so that it may on any sudden emergency expand to meet any contingency. This change will enable the Government to retain those who have been educated at the public expense. These, with many other considerations, lead us to the conclusion that greater efficiency, purity, and economy will be maintained in this service by its transfer. Indeed, there is reason to fear that to a very great extent these considerations are largely forgotten in the Department of the Interior. From its conduct one would be almost led to suppose the great truth that the Department is but an agent of the people is not regarded. Officers' salaries and emoluments are disposed of with a hand more prodigal than that with which even the spendthrift would scatter his stores. Let there be a return to the days of primal simplicity and frugality. Let it be known the Government and its offices are not made or maintained for the benefit of office-holders and hangers-on, but for the general good.

I ask for this subject your thoughtful consideration. I beg that all considerations of party or patronage may be forgotten. This bill provides for the removal on the 1st of July, 1877. Neither democrat nor republican can say now whether it is his own patronage he is diminishing or that of his competitor for popular favor. I believe the change to be right, and upon the broad principles of right and wrong I desire it shall be determined. I ask this in the name of the aged veteran who followed the chivalric Scott at Lundy's Lane, or the heroic Jackson at New Orleans, whose palsied limbs now tremble on the brink of the grave. In the name of the disabled heroes of Buena Vista and Cerro Gordo, I ask it. In the name of the boys in blue, who on the long, weary march, in the crowded hospital, on scores of battle-fields, amid the death-dealing storms of war, with their lives and blood sealed their devotion to their country and her flag, I ask it. It is my hope and trust that this subject should receive such consideration as will enable us to act upon it in an enlightened, conscientious, and statesman-like view.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. RANDALL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TURNEY reported that the Com-mittee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the special order, a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced the passage of a bill (H. R. No. 1251) to exclude the State of Missouri from the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

It further announced the passage of a bill (H. R. No. 1962) to confirm certain school-indemnity selections of public lands by the State of Nebraska, without amendment. It further announced the passage of the following bills; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 391) to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase parcel of land on the island of Key West, Florida; An act (S. No. 401) to incorporate the Citizens' Building Company of Washington;

An act (8. No. 384) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza Potter, widow of orenzo T. Potter, deceased, late of Charleston, South Carolina; An act (8. No. 333) for the relief of Major Foster A. Hixon, late a paymaster in the Army;

An act (S. No. 560) for the relief of Benjamin L. Cornish, late second lieutenant of the Thirty-second Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry;
An act (S. No. 561) for the relief of Major Junius T. Turner; and An act (S. No. 575) for the relief of Charles E. Hovey.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Walling for one week on important business, and to Mr. Meade for six days from the 16th instant on account of important business.

LAWS RELATING TO POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back, as a substitute for House bill No. 1304, a bill (H. R. No. 2684) to amend section 251 of an act to revive, consolidate, and amend statutes relating to the Postact to revive, consolidate, and amend statutes relating to the Post-Office Department, approved June 8, 1872, as amended by the twelfth section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes," approved June 23, 1874; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, with leave to expect the control of the report at any time.

PROMOTION OF NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Mr. FAULKNER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform this House whether the act of the 4th of August, 1854, and since incorporated in the Revised Statutes, section 1214, has according to the true intent and meaning of said act been carried into effect by the promotion of non-commissioned officers of the Army to appointments as commissioned officers in any corps of the line for which-they may have been found qualified, and, if so, to state to what extent that provision has operated to the promotion of non-commissioned officers, and what, if any, has been the effect upon the service of such promotion.

Mr. FAULKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

tucky Cavalry, for $100 bounty, deducting amounts heretofore received, in accordance with the terms of enlistment; and also, that the provisions of the general pension laws be extended to the widows and orphans of the deceased soldiers of said regiment, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WILLIS: Petition of Bernard McKiernan and several hundred others, for the passage of a law prohibiting traffic and monopoly in public land, to the Committee on Public Lands.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 16, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senate does not seem to be pressed with business, and, what is a singular fact, we adjourned at two o'clock yesterday. There is a great deal of business to be done in committee and a great deal of Department business. I therefore move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING presented the memorial of Balch, Price & Co., J. and W. Burroughs, and other leading business men of the city of Brooklyn, New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law, and praying for its amendment; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the memorial of Ovington Brothers, E. Lewis, E.

D. Burt & Co., and other leading merchants of the city of Brook-lyn, New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law, and praying for its amendment; which was referred to the Com-mittee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the memorial of James H. Pillinger, Kenyon & Newton, and other leading business men of the city of Brooklyn, New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the bankrupt law, and praying for its amendment; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom were referred three resolutions touching the printing of the reports of the debates of Congress in the Congressional Record, (one recommitted and two original,) to report them back and ask to be discharged from the consideration of the first two, and to report the third with an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the first two resolutions, if there be no objection. The third resolution will be reported and placed on the Calendar.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on Printing report the resolution with amendments which, if agreed to, will make the resolution read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the proceedings and debates of the two Houses of Congress shall be printed in the Congressional Record as actually taken down by the official reporters, (excepting grammatical errors, which may be corrected,) and shall be furnished to the printer in season for the number of the Record to be issued next after the day of such proceedings and debates.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not ask its present consideration, for I suppose, as it created some discussion when up before, it will be debated

Mr. CONKLING. Let the resolution be read again.

The Chief Clerk again read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar and printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom were referred a resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of increased mail-service on a route therein named; a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of increased mail-service on two routes therein named; a resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of additional service upon a route therein named; and numerous petitions, praying for the establishment of post-routes, have directed me to report them back and ask to be dis-named; and numerous petitions, praying for the establishment of post-routes, have directed me to report them back and ask to be discharged from their further consideration. These resolutions and memorials ask for increased service, and that is a matter of administration belonging exclusively by law to the Post-Office Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the memorials.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 605) for the relief and re-appointment of Captain Thomas B. Hunt, assistant-quartermaster in the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 606) to establish the Territory of Pembina, and to provide a temporary government therefor; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 607) for the relief of Eliza Howard Powers; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

GOLD AND SILVER.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I submit the following resolution for present action, if there is no objection:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish the Senate with a statement of the product of gold and silver in the United States from the year 1850 to the year 1875, inclusive; also, a similar statement for the same period of time of the product of gold and silver in other parts of the world; also, an estimate of the amount of gold and silver coin and bullion in the United States at the present time.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent.
Mr. DAVIS. Do I understand that the resolution calls for the product per annum of gold and silver in the United States?
Mr. BOUTWELL. For each year from 1850.
Mr. DAVIS. Does it so read?
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not so state.
Mr. BOUTWELL. Then I move to insert the word "annual," so as to read "annual product of gold and silver in the United States from the year 1850."

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest as an amendment that the statement commence with the year 1845 instead of 1850. To that I think there will be no objection.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Very well; I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. THURMAN. I suggest another point which the resolution does not embrace, and that is, that it state the annual import and export of gold, how much comes into the country and how much goes out. Of course by import I mean to include, as far as possible, all that is brought in by persons coming to this country, and by export all that which goes out. I am under the impression that some such report was made several years ago.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will not object to that amendment, but the last inquiry relative to the quantity of gold and silver coin and bullion in the United States at the present time will present the result. The imports and exports are processes affecting the result, which will be taken into account by the Director of the Mint in making up this statement under the third head of the resolution. However, if the Senator from Ohio thinks it important to know the progress of the trade in bullion, I do not object to the amendment he suggests. What we want is the result of both processes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to my colleague that, if he will look Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to my colleague that, if he will look at the last finance report or any one of those reports for the last six years, he will find appended a table which gives not only the exports but the imports for each year since the foundation of the Government of both gold bullion and other bullion. There are regular tables attached to the finance report which contain that information. However, if my colleague would like to have it in this form, I suppose there will be no objection.

Mr. THURMAN. I said that my impression was that I had seen such a report. The reason I desire the information is that I am of onlying a report. The reason I desire the information is that I am of opinion that a very great error exists in the public mind on this subject. There are a great many people who think that whenever there is a balance of trade against us it is all paid in gold. It is not forty-eight hours since I heard a very wise gentleman state that two hundred millions since I heard a very wise gentleman state that two hundred millions of gold were exported from this country every year to pay the balance against us. I am under the impression that the entire amount of gold ever exported from this country in any one year is only a little over $60,000,000, and that there is nothing like that as the average annual export of gold. If the tables are in the finance report mentioned by my colleague and if the facts are there, I do not desire to encumber the resolution with any further amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. My impression is that the idea of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurwax] is one which would be of great service. Prob-

Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] is one which would be of great service. Prob-Ohio [Mr. Thurman] is one which would be of great service. Probably the tables referred to do not contain the estimated amounts of exports and imports, although I am sure they contain the production and the amount in the country. At any rate, this information would be coupled with the rest and be easy of reckoning and easy of access. Therefore I think it would be well to include the annual import and export of gold. If the information is contained in the tables appended to the finance report, as the Senator from Ohio nearest me [Mr. Sherman] thinks it is, it would only involve the refurnishing of it on this sheet, and it would be a matter of general information.

SHERMAN] thinks it is, it would only involve the refurnishing of it on this sheet, and it would be a matter of general information.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said before that I had no objection to it if Senators wanted it, but as a matter of course our regular table of imports and exports shows for every year the amount of imports of gold and silver, just like any other import or export. Those tables are furnished to us and laid on our desks every year. There is one table attached to the finance report which contains a résumé for every year since the foundation of the Government. But I have no objection to including this information; and I think it would be just as well to have the information from the tables put on this paper in order to furnish not formation from the tables put on this paper in order to furnish not only the gold production but the amount of gold passing between this and foreign countries. Therefore I have no objection to the amendment

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I merely desire to say that the tables of the exports and imports of gold and silver will not be entirely accurate, for all or nearly all the gold that is carried abroad in the pockets of travelers fails to be entered at the custom-house, and large amounts are taken from the United States into the Canadian Dominions for the purchase of stock, of which no account is taken. Therefore any tables that we may have will not be entirely accurate.

Mr. DAVIS. However, it can be estimated, as it has been hereto-

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is not estimated at all.
Mr. WALLACE. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that what the country wants to know is not so much the amount of gold in the country as the amount of gold in the Treasury over and above the present demands upon that gold; and if he will so amend his resolution I think it will be more satisfactory.
Mr. BOUTWELL. I object to including that in this resolution. I am not seeking for the condition of the Treasury, but for the condition of the country with reference to the product and sunly of gold tion of the country with reference to the product and supply of gold and silver. The question how much there is in the Treasury can be ascertained by looking at the debt statement for the first of the present month.

Mr. WALLACE. Could not that just as well be ascertained in making this examination? Let us know the quantity in the Treasury.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I prefer that some other gentleman should introduce a resolution on that subject if the Senate desires to ascertain that fact. Let the resolution be read as it now stands modified. The Chief Clerk read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish the Senate with a statement of the annual product of gold and silver in the United States from the year 1845 to the year 1875, inclusive; also, the annual import and export of gold and silver from the beginning of the Government to the present time; also, a similar statement for the same period of time of the product of gold and silver in other parts of the world, and also an estimate of the amount of gold and silver coin and bullion in the United States at the present time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The introduction of the second amendment has disturbed the connection, and therefore in the third clause as to the product in the other parts of the word the language should be, "from 1845 to 1875 inclusive."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I should like to hear the resolution again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish the Senate with a statement of the annual product of gold and silver in the United States from the year 1845 to the year 1875, inclusive; also the annual import and export of gold from the beginning of the Government to the present time; also a similar statement of the product of gold and silver in other parts of the world from the year 1845 to 1875, inclusive; also an estimate of the amount of gold and silver coin and bullion in the United States at the present time.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I should like to hear the amendment of my colleague.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was not reduced to writing and not accepted.

Mr. WALLACE. It was not accepted. I suggested that the prop osition the country wanted to consider was, not the quantity of gold that has passed through our hands, but where is the actual amount of gold in the Treasury beyond the demands thereon. That is the pertinent question, it seems to me, for the Senate, and I move to amend the resolution, therefore, by adding some such words as these:

Also to show what the amount of gold in the Treasury is at this date, after deducting the actual demands thereon.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. That is more important, I think, than all the rest of the resolution; and if my colleague had not made the motion, I should move the amendment myself. I desire now to the motion, I should move the amendment myself. I desire now to know, and I think the whole country does, how much gold we have in the Treasury, how much we can rely upon when we compel the banks of the country to resume specie payments. That is the practical question. The rest is that sort of information which any man can get in an hour or two by going around the Departments. What we want to know now is how much we can depend upon when the day comes and the moment arrives when the whole business of this country is to be changed by the operations of the Treasury. I want to know especially how much gold we have got to-day or had last week, if you choose; and then we can judge how much we shall have next year, or the year following, or the year succeeding-1879-when resumption is to take place.

Mr. THURMAN. I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, although I believe precisely that question has been answered by the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives at this session; but it will cost very little trouble to repeat it in this document, and make it as complete as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania on the right of the Chair [Mr. WALLACE] will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the resolution the fol-

Also, that he state what amount of gold will be in the Treasury after deducting to present demands thereon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There will not be any, because all the greenbacks are a present demand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I rise simply to correct a statement which I made a moment ago, and which might be misunderstood. I said that it was my impression that the export of gold in no year had much exceeded sixty millions of dollars. I meant, of course, after deducting the import of gold. I believe, to speak more accurately, that the export over and above the import has reached as high as $71,000,000. I think that is the highest amount. Of course I deduct from the export the import, and speak only of the balance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill

Mr. Allison. I move to proceed to the consideration of the oni (S. No. 590) providing for an agreement with the Sioux Nation in re-gard to a portion of their reservation, and for other purposes. Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Before that motion is put I de-sire to have a letter read, which I think is a privileged question. Mr. MORTON. I have no objection to taking up the bill named by the Senator from Iowa, but will ask the Senate to take up the special ander the bill in regard to counting the electoral votes which by order, the bill in regard to counting the electoral votes, which by unanimous consent was to come up at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill will not be displaced. It was made the special order for one o'clock.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. What I have risen to is I believe a privileged question,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks for the reading of a paper as a privileged question. It will be read. The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Special dispatch to the Chicago Tribune.] PRIVATE SECRETARIES.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 12.

Washington, D. C., March 12.

The New York Mercury announces, in its letter from this city, that a large number of prominent Congressmen have private secretaries who are paid by the Government under various pretexts. It says:

"Your correspondent also learned that a young man on the pay-roll of the Treasury Department at the rate of $2,000 a year has, for nearly two years, been detailed, as private secretary to Senator Cameron. He does nothing else; is never at the Treasury except when drawing his salary; and in this way the people of the United States are taxed to pay for the private secretary to a Senator who, more than any other, can afford to have one for himself. There are other Senators who are favored in the same way. The private secretary of Senator West, of Louis'ana, is a clerk in the War Department. Another young man from the Indian Bureau fills the same position for Senator West, of louis, and another from the War Department is secretary for Senator West, of Indian Bureau fills the same position for Senator Wash, of Illinois. All these men are paid by the Treasury, though they perform no public service. Secretary Bristow knows it, yet he declines to interfere."

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, during the entire period of my service in the Senate this is the second time that I have risen to a personal explanation. I desire only to say that, so far as I am concerned, the statement just read is unqualifiedly false. I have never allowed a clerk in any of the Departments to write anything for me. Sometimes in their kindness to me clerks who belong to Pennsylvania have offered to assist me in my correspondence; but I have always refused such offers. All my writing is done by myself or a private secretary paid by myself.

I have for long years lived within my own income. I have always felt that a man who does not spend more than his income in any one year will not be under obligations pecuniarily to anybody; and I have acted on that rule. That rule will go a little further, and keep men from doing wrong things. The man or woman who will dress beyond his or her means, or who will buy diamonds without money to pay for them, will always be in trouble or in danger of getting into trouble. I have never got into that trouble I have had nothing to do with jobs. I have never purchased a dollar's worth of property in the District of Columbia amid all the temptations I have had in thirty years to do so; and I have never allowed anybody to buy any for my I have never had any connection pecuniarily with anybody in this Government, or in this District, or anywhere else. In short, Mr. President, I always attend to my own business; I think it is better done in that way.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I believe my name is the next one mentioned in that category. [Laughter.] I will only say in regard to it that, if that correspondent will furnish me the name of that young man I will order him to report to-morrow morning at nine o'clock for duty. He has never presented himself yet.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it due to my colleague, [Mr. WRIGHT,] whose name I see mentioned there, and who is necessarily absent from his seat in the Senate to-day by illness, that I should say that there is not one word of truth in that statement so far as it applies to him.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not in the habit of rising to personal explanations in the Senate; but inasmuch as my name is mentioned in this article and it is brought before the Senate, I will take this occasion to say that it is an infamous lie, and it is only a part of the infamous to say that it is an infamous lie, and it is only a part of the infamous lies that have been sent from this city of Washington about me for the last four months in reference to everything that could be imagined. They are wholesale lies, and that is about all that the class of persons who are engaged in Washington City in sending these things write. I never had a private secretary detailed from any Department in my life. I do my own writing. There is a clerk to my committee who is paid like other committee clerks; and he does not belong to the War Department or to any other Department, but came here with me from Chicago, a private citizen, to act as clerk to my committee. That is all the clerk I have or have ever had, and he is the clerk of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think if we devote ourselves to responding to all the falsehoods that are stated about this body and about men engaged in public affairs there will be no time to legislate at all, because the newspapers are published daily all over the country and they can furnish occupation, and constant occupation, if we engage in the business of feeling obliged to get up every time a lie is told and say it is not so. I am reminded of that especially in this connection, for I find lying on the desk of my friend at my side a paragraph in the Baltimore Gazette, which sets forth:

graph in the Baltimore Gazette, which sets forth:

It is now pretty definitely ascertained that the Administration has urged its friends in the Senate to resist by every possible means the passage of the act passed by the House for the protection of witnesses who testify before congressional committees. The effort to secure its defeat in the Senate will be headed by CONKLING, who has been engaged for several days in looking up authorities to support his side. Whether EDMUNDS will second him or not is as yet uncertain. Locan is especially active to secure the defeat of the measure, because there are several persons under indictment in Chicago for their connection with whisky frauds who would be glad to get off by telling all they know about LOGAN's connection with crooked whisky to a congressional committee. It is really a matter of life and death with more than one prominent republican that this act should be defeated, and they will leave no stone unturned to accomplish it.

Lof course should not have said anything about this sort of thing.

I of course should not have said anything about this sort of thing, because it would take all our time if I did, if the subject had not been brought up at this moment; but I feel competent to say from the Judiciary Committee, who have the bill referred to in charge— and I think I can may for every member of it of both parties; although I am not authorized to say it, but I will take that liberty—that in respect of any influence from any quarter, Administration or outside, or from Senators on the subject of that bill, there has not been a particle of any description, and that the committee are considering the bill in a regular way, and when they make up their minds about it they will undoubtedly report.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I ought perhaps to say, that so far

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, rought perhaps to say, that so far from the Committee on the Judiciary doing anything to delay that bill—if it is not improper to state what took place in the committee thus far—it was taken up out of its order, and it is the first business now before the committee, and is receiving the earnest consideration of the committee. I can say for one, that I never have known or heard of any outside influence being brought to bear upon any member of the Committee on the Judiciary in connection with it.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it cannot be more unusual for the Senator from Illinois behind me [Mr. Logan] than for me to refer to newspaper paragraphs, such, for example, as this one to which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has called attention; but because of the somewhat general uprising this morning to make denial, should I remain silent room might be left for injurious inference. For this reason it may be well to say that, as far as regards me and as far as I know, or have heard in respect of others, except as I list-ened to the reading by the Senator from Vermont, there is no truth, none at all, no foundation whatever for the allegations in the paragraph read, and no pretext for them.

In this respect, however, the paragraph is not singular, but one of a multitude. But, as the Senator from Vermout has well said, he, who charged with public responsibility, attempts in these days to follow up or answer all the vile imputations—for such they are they are more than untruths, they are malicious, studied imputations— he who attempts to follow up these sinister false statements, and suc-ceeds, must be industrious indeed. For one I have spared myself such efforts for all these years, and have been willing to trust to truth and to the sense of my countrymen to find it out in the end.

The mention of this subject suggests one further remark: The popular elections recently held in my own State and elsewhere, just now notably in New Hampshire, give me one satisfaction above all others. They go far to show that, if the time has not passed, it is rapidly passing when the American people can be blinded, deceived, and misled by the incessant perversions of facts and events, and the monstrous aspersions poured at large on men in public life, and men in the way of other men, and on the agencies and instrumenmen in the way of other men, and on the agencies and instrumentalities of government. These elections confirm the hope that if the time has not come, it is near at hand, when the sin and fall of an individual—the crime and guilt of individual offenders who betray their trusts and defile themselves, can no longer be expanded and dispersed for partisan and revengeful uses till it begrimes the body of men charged with public administration. The day, I trust, is near at hand when the licentiousness of such abuse will no longer escape through understanding, when it will be no longer regarded as an evil extending only to the defamation and attempted destruction of individuals, but when it will be regarded, as it is, as a crime against progress and free institutions.

The inference from these years of accumulated accusation against those intrusted with national affairs, is that time has failed to make good the idea or the hope that republican government is better than monarchy.

These institutions of ours were builded only recently—their foundthese institutions of ours were builded only recently—their foundations were laid not in the gray twilight of an early age, but when the beams of many centuries lighted the builders—the architects were picked men from different nationalities, and they had profoundly studied governments in all their known forms—the theater whereon the experiment has been working is favored above other lands; if such a government, blest in opportunity—the only considerable experiment of free government extant on the globe, has indeed at the end of a century culminated in a saturnalia of fraud, in a carnival of end of a century culminated in a saturnalia of fraud, in a carnival of venality, and unworthiness, it is time to ask who shall come next in the march of nations to dispute the divinity of kings? Which nation shall brave the danger of rearing "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people," if in truth it be that in the last half of the nineteenth century the only such government on earth is honey-combed with venality, fraud, betrayal, bribery, infamy? Truth and patriotism rise up against such monstrous misrepresentations, and truth and patriotism will prevail against them.

Individuals may flinch under these inflictions; but I con-No, sir. Individuals may flinch under these inflictions; but I console myself in the belief, of which I see may signs, that the discern ing judgment which resides in great masses of men will winnow the wheat from the chaff, and the chaff from the wheat, and distinguish between those who fall, or have fallen, fallen before temptation, and those who, making no parade of public or of private virtue, but walking by the lights and with the modicum of integrity vouchsafed to common mortals, strive in heart and conscience to do the duties set before them. My belief is, that it grows surer and safer, that it is safer now than it was not long ago, for every man who is honest to trust his reputation to the general discernment, the conscience, and intelligence of his countrymen.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I certainly should not add a word to what has been said, but that there is one thought to which I desire at least to give expression in reference to these attacks which are being made in the newspapers.

It is asserted in this paper that certain Senators here are very busy urging in every possible way the defeat of a certain bill. I must confess that until now I did not know that that bill had reached the Senate. I suppose I neglected when it was reported here to listen to it, and certainly neglected to examine the records in regard to it. call upon every Senator who belongs to the Judiciary Committee if I have ever mentioned that subject to any of them or any other Senator on this floor, either for or against the bill. I do not know what the bill is.

Mr. President, it has become common in this country whenever a question is before the Congress of the United States for certain persons to write articles for newspapers, or telegraphic dispatches, ascribing corrupt motives to members and Senators for either favoring or opposing a bill. Here my name is mentioned in connection with opposition to the bill named. Whether I shall oppose it or not, God knows; I cannot tell until I hear it read; and I pledge my word before my God and country that I will either oppose or favor it as my own judgment shall dictate, irrespective of what any man may say or any newspaper may say. I have always, I hope, had that much independence; but I am said to oppose the bill; why? Because I have friends connected with the whisky ring that I want to protect!

I believe there is no man in this country who has had the political life I have had who has been more maligned, slandered, and abused than I have been. From the time I entered the service of my country in 1861 up to this time there is no crime known in the catalogue of crimes that I have not been accused of by infamous liars, villains, scoundrels, and slanderers. I have been inked all over this winter. When I was lying on my sick bed, not able to turn myself in bed, some papers charged that I was pretending to be sick because I was afraid of the exposure of whisky frauds.

I cared nothing for these charges. I never answered them. I believed that the people of my country knew me well enough to know that they were vile slanders. But, inasmuch as the subject has been brought up this morning, I desire to say that I never have been interested in a distillery in Chicago or any other place, and never owned a dollar of stock in a distillery in my life. I never trafficked in a gallon of whisky in my life. I never had a cent's interest in whisky, wines, high-wines, or anything of that character in my life, directly or indirectly. More than that, I never knew of any frauds myself until they were developed: I never winked at one in my life; never until they were developed; I never winked at one in my life; never had any associations with the men who may have perpetrated them that would even justify a suspicion against me. I knew nothing whatever about these frauds except as they were published. No man whatever about these frauds except as they were published. No man can say that I have ever thrown a straw in the way of the Government prosecuting any man charged with any offense whatever, although it has been charged time and again that I was interposing here in behalf of indicted men. I appeal to the officers of the Government, and they will tell you that I have never spoken to one of them on the subject one way or the other. They accuse me of having friends indicted. There is perhaps one or two men indicted for fraud that I recommended for office, but I certainly believed them to be heavet. I presume other goatlamen have recommended more fraud that I recommended for office, but I certainly believed them to be honest. I presume other gentlemen have recommended men for office who probably have done wrong. I may have recommended a man for office who may be indicted for whisky frauds. If that is a crime, to that extent I am guilty, but no more.

I now wish to say a word further, and it is the last time I expect to answer any charge whatever that is made against me. The other day in the New York World it was said that there was information before the committee of the House of which Mr. CLYMER is the chairman that I was connected with the "Teton Sioux" scandal. What that scandal is I do not know; but I went to Mr. CLYMER and asked him, in the presence of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and he said it was a lie made out of whole cloth; that he had never said such a word, and never had heard of it. This is the way these things go over the country.

I have been charged in the newspapers with everything. If I am guilty of anything, let them bring it forward. I know not why it is that these charges are made against me all the time. I know nothing of them except to know they are lies. I know, more than that, that the man does not live on the face of God's green earth who will stand before me and face me and say such things are true. They may slander me and malign me, but no man has the manhood to face me in open day and charge me with these offenses to my face. Cowards may hide behind newspapers, but brave and honest men never do it. I slander nobody myself. I accuse no man of crime except when the crime is proven. I have that much manhood. My charges against men are to their faces, in the open day. These malignant, lying, viperous, hissing, slanderous vampires, that desire to destroy the reputawhich our foundation as a government rests, by trying to make the country believe that every man who is in public life is a thief.

This much I say; no more, no less, Mr. President.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. A message from the Fresident of the United States, by Mr. U. S. Grant, jr., his Secretary, announced that the act (S. PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. McDONALD, it was PASSAGE BETWEEN CUMBERLAND AND SAINT SIMON SOUNDS.

Mr. NORWOOD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to the Senate his opinion as to the importance and practicability of deepening the inside passage between Cumberland Sound and Saint Simon's Sound, State of Georgia, with estimates of the probable cost of such improvement in connection with any contemplated improvement of the inside passage between Fernandina and the Saint John's River.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the special order is now before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the considera-tion of the bill (S. No. 1) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper] proposed an amendment for which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Johnston] moved a substitute, and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Frelinghuysen] has moved to perfect the text of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee by an amendment which is now the pending question. The Secretary will report it.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] is to add to the second section of the bill:

And if the two Houses do not agree as to which return shall be counted, then that vote shall be counted which the House of Representatives, voting by States, in the manner provided by the Constitution when the election devolves upon the House, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Freling-huysen] is to strike out all after the word "agree" in the first line of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, and insert:

The difference shall be immediately referred to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the Presiding Officer of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House, whose decision shall be final. If the Chief Justice is absent or unable to attend, the senior associate justice of the Supreme Court present in the Capitol or other place of meeting shall act in his place.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey proposes to refer the difference between the two Houses to the umpirage of three individuals: the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. It is plain that this is not referring it to any judicial tribunal, and if such a reference as this can be made then it is equally clear that a reference might be made to any other three individuals. There is nothing in the fact that the three individuals named in the amendment are officers of the Government. If this reference can be made to them it may be made to three private citizens, and it can only therefore be justified upon the ground that Congress, having power to provide by law the mode of counting the votes, its power is almost or quite unlimited in the choice of the means. I shall not undertake to say what are the limits upon our power of legislation in this respect. It is always dangerous to undertake to set fixed limits to a power of the Government before the case arises, for the plain reason that no one can foresee all the cases that may arise in the history of the country.

But it seems to me perfectly clear that this proposition is not consistent with the spirit of the Constitution. The Constitution provides—and I beg pardon for occupying the time of the Senate in saying what has been said and what is known to every Senator; and yet the importance of this subject will be perhaps a sufficient excuse

The President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

From the plain language of the Constitution, no function or duty is devolved on the President of the Senate except to "open all the certificates in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives." is not said that he shall count them, nor is it said in express words that they shall be counted by the two Houses in joint convention, and the practice of the Government has not been entirely uniform. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] called our attention the other day to the proceedings when the vote was counted at the first election, the election of General Washington as President of the United States and Mr. Adams as Vice-President, and it is true that those proceedings did give some color to his proposition that the power of counting, and therefore the power of determining what is the true return, is vested in the President of the Senate. I say those proceedings seemed to give some color to that proposition, because in that case "John Langdon, esq., one of the Senators from the State of New Hampshire, was elected President of the Senate for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States." That languages would seem to interest the them. States." That language would seem to import that he was to do the counting, and yet it does not necessarily follow, because a President of the Senate was necessary in order that the votes might be opened, and therefore in order that they might be counted, and nothing, I think, of any great force can be gathered from the use of that language in the resolution appointing Mr. Langdon President of the Sen-The proceedings, however, go on further. On the 6th of April, 1789, it was ordered by the Senate-this was immediately on the election of Mr. Langdon-

Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States.

The same remarks that I have made in reference to the resolution by which Mr. Langdon was appointed will apply to this part of the order that the fact be communicated to the House of Representatives. Then the order goes on further:

And that the Senate is now ready in the Senate Chamber to proceed in the presence of the House to discharge that duty,

What "duty" is here spoken of? What duty is it that the Senate is to discharge? If you take the language of the order, it can only be the duty of counting the votes. It then proceeds further:

And that the Senate have appointed one of their members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared, submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose.

That was the order of the Senate, and Mr. Ellsworth subsequently reported that he had delivered the message. Then-

Mr. Bondinot, from the House of Representatives, communicated the following verbal message to the Senate:

"Mr. President: I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House is ready forthwith to meet the Senate to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the electors of the President and Vice-President of the United States."

And he withdraw.

And he withdrew.

That sheds no light on the subject.

The Speaker and the House of Representatives attended in the Senate Chamber for the purpose expressed in the message delivered by Mr. Ellsworth; and after some time withdrew.

some time withdrew.

The Senate then proceeded by ballot to the choice of a President of their body pro tempore. John Langdon, esq., was duly elected.

The President elected for the purpose of counting the votes declared to the Senate that the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, which were as follows.

Then follows the table. Certainly it must be admitted that, looking at that record alone, it would seem as if the idea at the commencement of the Government was that the President of the Senate was not only to open but that he was to count the votes. I am told —I have not seen it and referred to it myself—that these proceedings which I have read from our Manual are not quite complete, and that a reference to the Journal rebuts to some extent the presumption arising from what I have read; that it was considered then that the duty of counting the votes devolved on the President of the Senate; but I do not think that much weight can be attached to that precedent dent, even though it was set by those who met immediately after the adoption of the Federal Constitution. No question was then made; there was no contest for the Presidency; General Washington had received every vote; and there was no contest of any consequence for the office of Vice-President. There was nothing to do but the min-isterial duty of making a table of the electoral votes and adding it up. That was all; and a precedent set under those circumstances, without any discussion whatsoever and where there was nothing to raise any discussion or question, is not one entitled to any great weight in settling a matter so important as this.

For reasons which I have already stated and which I shall not bore the Senate with repeating, it seems to me quite inadmissible to adopt the theory that the counting of these votes, and consequently the function of judging which is the true return, is devolved upon the President of the Senate. The bare fact, which we are to presume must have been foreseen by the framers of the Constitution, that the Vice-President might himself be a candidate for the Presidency or for reelection, shows that, if the counting of the votes were devolved upon him if the indicate further of deadding upon the validity of the residence. him, if the judicial function of deciding upon the validity of the returns were devolved upon him, it would be devolved upon a man who was a judge in his own cause. There is no provision in the Constitution that if he is a candidate he shall not act in the premises; on the contrary, the provision of the Constitution is so mandatory that, as was shown by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morron] the other day, in no less than six instances has the Vice-President opened the votes when he himself was a candidate either for the office of President or for re-election to that of Vice-President; and to say that our Constitution is so defective that it makes the determination of who has been elected the Chief Mogistrate of the Penphlic to depend on the best of the contract of the Penphlic to depend on the best of the chief Mogistrate of the Penphlic to depend on the best of the Penphlic to depend on the best of the Chief Mogistrate of the Penphlic to depend on the penphlic to depend on the penphlic to the penp elected the Chief Magistrate of the Republic to depend upon the will of the very man who is a candidate for that office is to condemn the Constitution beyond redemption. No, sir, the Constitution is not so Constitution beyond redemption. No, sir, the Constitution is not so defective as that. Nothing but the strongest, clearest, and most precise language could drive us to an interpretation of that sort. I therefore think, with great deference to my friend from Maryland who took that ground the other day that that interpretation is not the correct one, and while the twenty-second joint rule was, in my judgment, an improper rule, and while the subject was not one to be regulated by any joint rule of the two Houses, but to be regulated by law—yet I think that the determination then arrived at, after discussion, after a full consideration of the subject and in the light of the experience of the Republic is worth much more than this precedent set by the of the Republic, is worth much more than this precedent set by the first Congress in counting the votes for General Washington.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question, if I do not interrupt him?

Mr. THURMAN. With great pleasure.

I was diverted for a moment during part of his Mr. CONKLING. argument. I beg to inquire whether the Constitution, as he understands it, means in the words "the votes shall then be counted," that the counting must be by the two Houses? He has been explaining himself touching the function of the presiding officer. My inquiry is whether these words which he understands, commit to Congress or, more exactly speaking, to the two Houses of Congress then gress or, more exactly speaking, to the two Houses of Congress then assembled, the duty of counting the votes; or whether the words "the votes shall then be counted," leave a discretion to the law-making power to provide by whom the count shall be made?

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from New York was not, I think, here on the former day when I gave to the Senate my view—

Mr. CONKLING. I was not; I would not have interrupted him if I had been. I was necessarily absent that day and did not hear the

I had been. I was necessarily absent that day and did not hear the

Mr. THURMAN. I have no objection to restating, and I will endeavor to do it briefly, my view on that subject. I think that the spirit of the Constitution requires that these votes shall be counted in some mode by Congress or the convention of the two Houses; but what shall be the mode? Now, I repeat what I said the other day, that it is a fundamental principle that, where any power is conferred upon the Government, or any Department, or officer thereof, and the mode of exercising that power is not prescribed in the Constitution itself, it belongs to the law-making power to prescribe the mode. I said the other day that that was a fundamental principle of the Government, but I need not have gone to any general principles of government, because it is expressly declared in the Constitution, as we all know in the very familiar paragraph, the last of section 8 of article 1, in which, after enumerating the powers of Congress, it is said:

The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department

What could be broader than that? It is wel! known that that was only put in out of abundant caution; that those powers would have belonged to the Congress by necessary implication, even if that clause were stricken out of the Constitution; but it is put in there that there may be no question about it that Congress has these powers.

Now, the power to count these votes must be a power of the Government or of some Department or officer thereof. If it is, then Congress has power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution that power. I have, therefore, thought from the beginning that a joint-rule was not the proper mode, but that a law was the proper mode, and that that law would be binding upon Congress, as well as upon everybody else, as long as it remained in force. Then comes the question, What mode shall be prescribed? I have said before that I do not undertake to place limits arbitrarily upon the mode which we may adopt. Definitions are very dangerous, as every lawyer knows. It is not safe to undertake beforehand, and before the case arises, to make an arbitrary, absolute definition, the boundaries of which can never be passed, no matter what may be the exigency. That is always unsafe. Therefore no wise man is apt to go beyond the case in hand, whether he is sitting as a judge or sitting as a Senator.

I do not undertake, then, to say what are the boundaries of our nower, in the execution of our legislative duty, to provide for the mode of counting these votes; but this I do say, that the spirit of the Constitution requires that this matter shall be settled, if it is possible to settle it, by the Senate and the House of Representatives, either acting separately or acting in joint convention. Either one way or the other, the spirit of the Constitution requires that it shell be settled in that mode. The Senators and Representatives are to be present when the votes are counted. They are to be opened in their presence. The usage of the Government has been to appoint tellers from the two bodies; and it seems to me that it never was contemplated that the determination of any question which should arise npon that count should be decided by some other tribunal or body

This being my view, I cannot concur with the idea that this power can be devolved upon the Supreme Court, as was suggested, if I am not mistaken, by no less eminent a Senator and distinguished a jurist than the present chairman of the Judiciary Committee at a former session. You cannot compel the Supreme Court to execute any such power as a court; that is very certain. The Supreme Court, as a court, has nothing but judicial power; and its original jurisdiction is expressly defined in the Constitution; and determining any question of election is not one of the original powers thus conferred on the court. Then the other powers of the Supreme Court are appellate powers. It has such appellate jurisdiction as may be provided by law; that is, as Congress may confer upon it. As I said the other day, the appellate jurisdiction spoken of in the Constitution is appelday, the appellate jurisdiction spoken of in the Constitution is appellate jurisdiction from the inferior judicial tribunals of the country. That I am right in this has been settled by the Supreme Court again and again. If my memory is not at fault, there is an old case away back in Dallas's Reports, in which the Supreme Court held that they could not determine an appeal from one of the Executive Departments of the Government. But we have lately had the most marked case, the most important case that could possibly arise on that question perhaps, thoroughly investigated by the Supreme Court. be remembered that when the Court of Claims was established its sole power was to hear and decide whether a claim was established its sole power was to hear and decide whether a claim was valid or not, without any power to give judgment. It could simply report its finding to Congress; it had no power to give any judgment whatsoever. That was the Court of Claims as originally constituted. An act was passed authorizing an appeal to the Supreme Court from this finding of the Court of Claims. The Supreme Court after an elaborate discussion decided that no such appeal could be entertained by the Supreme Court, because the Court of Claims as then constituted, having no power to render a judgment, was not a judicial tribunal at all, but a mere commission, and that the power of appeal to the Supreme Court was limited to appeals from judicial tribunals, and therefore it was held that the appeal would not lie, and it was dismissed. Congress, to remedy that defect, then passed the present law giving to the Court of Claims the power to render judgment; and since that appeals to the Supreme Court have always been entertained by that court. This is the latest and most authoritative decision after great discussion and great consideration, that the Supreme Court can en-tertain no appeal except from judicial tribunals and exercise no function that is not judicial. I do not, therefore, believe that this power can be given to the Supreme Court as a court, and for that reason I am strengthened in the belief that it is a question which ought to be settled by the Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator let me interpose there for a mo-

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.
Mr. CONKLING. The Senator has just concluded an argument addressed, as I understand it, to the incompetency of one agency to receive a delegation of this power. He has argued to show that the Supreme Court as a court is such a creature under the Constitution that it cannot be charged with this function. That is all. If it does not interrupt or unpleasantly dislocate the argument of the Senator, I wish he would tell us what his opinion is as to the power of the two Houses, the law-making power, to deposit it with some agency or instrumentality whose function is not so limited by the Constitution that it cannot receive and perform this duty. That is the question to which my mind addresses itself—the Senator, I am sure, will apprehend me—whether the law-making power may create an instrumentality for this purpose, although it may be true that the Supreme Court as such is an instrumentality which by the laws of its own being would be incompetent to become such an instrument.

Mr. THURMAN. I had already said that I would not undertake to define our legislative power in providing a mode for the solution of this problem, for the reason that I stated it would be dangerous to attempt it. But this I have intimated, and this I say now more distinctly, that in my judgment we shall act most within the spirit of the Constitution and nearest to its letter if this matter shall be decided by the Senators and the Representatives of the people, and that we ought not for one moment to think of going outside of the Congress if we can find a proper and safe mode for deciding this question within the halls of Congress.

That brings us to the question, Can we devise such a mode? The whole difficulty arises from the fact that two or more returns may be made from a State. That is no fanciful apprehension, for that fact has occurred in the past and may occur again in the future. To let the first section of this bill stand and strike out the second section would, as I said the other day, have the effect to throw the determination of the question, in cases where there were two or more returns, into the hands of the President of the Senate, and that I do not think there are many Senators on this floor who would agree to. Such, I think, is not the Constitution.

Then you must provide some other mode. The second section of the bill provides that all the returns shall be opened and laid before the convention that is assembled. That prevents the President of the Senate, by merely presenting a single return and suppressing the other, from determining the question; and it is obviously proper that he should be required to lay all the returns before the convention. In fact, the Constitution declares that he "shall open all the certificates;" and if he is not invested, as I have argued, with the power of determining which is the valid certificate and which is not the valid certificate, then it follows that it is his constitutional duty to open all the returns and to lay them before the joint convention. there might be some question about that, this second section very properly makes it his duty to do so. Then what does it provide? It provides that that return shall be counted which the Senate acting separately, and the House acting separately, shall decide to be the valid return. But then arises the difficulty immediately, the possibility, nay, it may be the probability, that one House may decide in favor of one return, and the other House in favor of another return, and that therefore neither return could be counted, and the vote of the State would be lost.

The paramount duty of Congress is to see that no State shall lose her vote, that no State shall be deprived of her voice in the selection of the Chief Magistrate of the nation; and therefore we cannot, as it seems to me, with propriety put any scheme upon our statute-book which is so radically defective as this. We ought to provide for the ultimate decision. When we come to provide for the ultimate decision. ion there is great trouble. If we take the proposition of my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. Cooper,] that the voice of the House expressed in the manner provided in his amendment shall predominate over that of the Senate, we place before the House a very strong temptation to disagree with any conclusion at which the Senate may arrive, because the effect of the disagreement is to throw power into the hands of the House. That is certainly a very serious objection; for, although we are bound to consider that the House of Representatives is a responsible part of the Government and not to impute to it or to its members any improper motive, yet we do know that, so weak is human nature, the best prayer that was ever uttered was "Lead us not into temptation."

In view of this, and believing that this matter ought to be settled by the Senators and Representatives in Congress, and looking also at the Constitution, which requires the votes to be opened and to be counted in the presence of both Houses, I have come to the conclusion that the proposition of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Johnston] is the nearest to the Constitution in its spirit and in its letter, and probably in practice would be the best that could be adopted. In counting the votes Congress does not act in a legislative capacity. We all agree to that. The Constitution convenes both Houses together, as it were in a joint convention; and although it does not declare that that joint convention shall act as a convention, although it confers upon it by no direct or express words any function at all, either of decision or of legislation, certainly none of legislation, yet the idea of the Constitution is that the Senate is to be there, the representatives of the States, as well as the members of the House, the representatives of the People, and that all are to participate in the decision of this great question, who has been elected to the Chief Magistracy of the Republic? And therefore it does seem to me that we are abiding by the Constitution more closely, both abiding by its letter and its spirit more closely, when we make both the Senate and the House of Representatives acting together the ultimate umpire where the two Houses have disagreed. I see no other solution that is likely to be as satisfactory to the people, to the country, to the States, and to the requirements of justice and truth. Hence, unless something shall be urged that shall alter my opinion on this subject, I am inclined to favor the proposition of the Senator from Virginia. That, if adopted, will require the Senate to act as well as the House. That will not be an abnegation of any power on the part of the Senate, as it might seem that the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee would be. That will require of us to perform the function whi would be. That will require of us to perform the function which reason and our presence there when the votes are counted as required by the Constitution would seem to impose upon us.

Then the only point that remains, if I am right in this view, is, How shall that question be decided? Shall it be decided by a vote of the two Houses sitting as a convention, a vote in which the ballot or the voice of each Senator and each Representative is to count one, as if it was one body; or shall it be, as the amendment proposes, that the vote shall be taken so that each State shall have one vote? Upon that question a great deal can be said on both sides. A great deal can be said in favor of a vote in the joint convention just as if it was one body, or a vote as proposed by the amendment by States; and it is very difficult indeed to make a satisfactory argument, owing to the fact that there is so much ambiguity in the Constitution upon this subject. But if I am right in saying that the mode of counting is left to the law-making power, it would follow that we have a right to adopt any mode which is fair and just and consistent with the spirit of the Constitution. I have endeavored to show that it is not consistent with the spirit of the Constitution to devolve this power upon the Supreme Court, nor consistent with the spirit of the Constitution to devolve this power upon the Supreme Court, nor consistent with the spirit of the Constitution to devolve this power upon the Supreme Court, nor consistent with the spirit of the Constitution to devolve the power upon the Supreme Court, nor consistent with the spirit of the Constitution to devolve the power upon the Supreme Court, nor consistent with the spirit of the Constitution, and that is not opposed to any express provision of the Constitution, and that is not opposed to any express provision of the Constitution, and that is consistent with truth and justice, we are at liberty to adopt.

I think, therefore, after much reflection on this very difficult subject, that it is competent for us to adopt the mode proposed by the Senator from Virginia; and then the only point that remains is, is that the mode most consistent with the spirit of the Constitution 7 As I said, there might be some difficulty about that; but, inasmuch as it is somewhat in analogy to the way in which the vote of the House is taken when the House elects a President, a pretty far-fetched analogy, I am compelled to admit, I am inclined to think that that is the lest mode in which we can solve this engage.

I thank the Senate for having listened to me again on this subject, and promise not to trouble them any more.

I thank the Senate for having listened to me again on this subject, and promise not to trouble them any more.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, so meager is the provision of the Constitution in reference to the counting of votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, and so entirely blank is that instrument as to any mode of deciding upon the authenticity or validity of the certificates, that it would almost seem, and some Senators appear really to be of the opinion, that our fathers in framing the Constitution must have acted upon the Irishman's plan of constructing a cannon; which was to make first a large hole and then cast the cannon around it. The Constitution, in one view of it, certainly seems to have taken one step in that process, and seems to have left to us only the ingenuity of taking the other, unless we find upon examination that what at first seems to be a vacuum is in fact filled, and becomes solid by some implication from the affirmative provisions of the Constitution itself.

As to the affirmative provisions which it has made, it is very clear that no joint convention of the two Houses for the counting of the presidential vote is contemplated where the votes of all are to be taken collectively. It is not even expressly provided that the two Houses shall meet, though this is clearly implied, as the votes are to be opened and counted in the presence of both Houses. The language is this:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

Representatives, open an the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

It does not say by whom the votes shall be counted; and as it does expressly provide that the President of the Senate shall open all the certificates, and then immediately declares that "the votes shall then be counted," without saying by whom, there is, as it seems to me, a fair though not conclusive inference that it is not made the duty of the President of the Senate to count them, because, if this had been intended, the language in that connection would naturally have been, as already suggested by several Senators, "the President of the Senate " * * shall open all the certificates and count the votes."

Now, as this counting is required to be in the presence of the two Houses, and no provision is made by whom the actual count shall be made, it seems to me that the counting may be considered as, in legal effect, the work of the two Houses, for which each is responsible. Not that each member of each House shall actually count all the votes and make the necessary lists, which would be practically very difficult, but that each House should appoint some member or members of its own to count them; in other words, to act as tellers, and to perform their work in the presence of the two Houses. This is the mode provided in the twenty-second joint rule, now repealed, and in the first section of the bill now before us, and this mode is I think the fair result of the interpretation of the Constitution above indicated; and the matters of mere detail for the purpose of accomplishing this mode of counting and of deciding, as provided in the first, third, and fourth sections of the bill, would, I am inclined to think, come fairly within the constitutional power of Congress.

sult of the interpretation of the Constitution above indicated; and the matters of mere detail for the purpose of accomplishing this mode of counting and of deciding, as provided in the first, third, and fourth sections of the bill, would, I am inclined to think, come fairly within the constitutional power of Congress.

As to the question between the provisions of the twenty-second joint rule, preventing any vote being counted except by the concurrent vote of the two Houses, and the provisions of this bill, that no vote or votes from any State shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses, the question is not so clear as it might at first appear; the difference between the two Houses would necessarily be upon the authenticity or validity of the return or certificate, as there could be no other ground upon which either House could honestly reject the votes, and a dishonest rejection the framers of the Constitution certainly did not attempt to provide for. But a difficulty arises here from the silence of the Constitution, which does not seem to have contemplated the possibility of any disagreement of the two Houses upon the authenticity or validity of the certificate; and yet we all know that such difference of opinion and such disagreement not only may arise, but have actually occurred. Still this question of the authenticity of the certificate, though not provided for or apparently thought of by the framers of the Constitution, is actually and necessarily involved in the counting of the votes, which they did provide for, and therefore within every recognized principle of interpretation must be considered as having been contemplated by them, and yet they have made no express provision for the decision of the question arising upon such a difference. But is no mode for its decision to be fairly implied?

If the mode of deciding such a difference between the two Houses is implied or fairly inferable from the provision actually made, that implication is as much a part of the Constitution as if expressed, and no different mode of deciding the question would be within the power of Congress.

Now, if it be true that under the Constitution the counting is to be considered, in legal effect, the act of the two Houses; and if, as I have suggested, the question of the due authentication of the certificates of election is necessarily involved and included in the counting provided for, then, as there is an absence of any express provision for any other mode of decision, it would seem almost of necessity to follow that the decision upon the authenticity and validity of the certificates should be decided by the same bodies who make the count; in other words, by the two Houses, whose act in legal effect the counting is. But if a decision by the two Houses, or, as claimed by some, the decision by the President of the Senate, is by fair implication from the Constitution the mode of decision intended, then very clearly no other mode can be provided by Congress any more than if the implication claimed had been an express provision of the Constitution.

Up to this point no difficulty could arise if both Houses agree in their decision; nor could there be any difficulty if the two Houses were acting strictly in joint convention, so that the vote of each member of that joint body should count as part of the aggregate of the whole. But if they are to act and decide separately, and not jointly, as seems to have been conceded, each House may come to a different conclusion; one for allowing the certificate and counting the vote, and the other against it. And a similiar difficulty would arise in reference to the first section of this bill when there is but one return from a State, as under the second, when there are two sets of certificates. The question is, Who or what tribunal shall decide when the two Houses acting separately disagree? If the authority of the two is equal and opposed to the other in its decision, how much greater reason is there for saying that the certificates from any State shall be admitted and the vote counted than for holding that it shall not be admitted or counted. Certainly it cannot be said that there has been any decision in its favor; and there may be much difficulty in finding any more intelligible ground for holding that the vote should be counted than that it should be excluded. It was, I suppose, upon considerations like this that the twenty-second rule was adopted. And yet the result, I confess, does not strike my mind as favorable or just, since it puts it in the power of either House alone to disfranchise. a State. Just reasoning should lead to just results; and when it does not, a lurking fallacy is to be suspected. And we should seek to find where it is; or, if not found, then whether the difficulty does not arise from the actual deficiency of the Constitution itself.

It was said yesterday that when the two Houses disagree, their au-It was said yesterday that when the two Houses disagree, their authority being equal, the equilibrium might be overcome and the scales turned in favor of the admission of the certificate and the counting of the vote by the presumption in favor of the authenticity and validity of the certificate. That would be so if the validity and authenticity were conceded; but it is precisely this which is not conceded, and about which the two Houses disagree. And if we are to base our presumption upon the face of the papers alone and the signature and seal, it would seem to be begging the whole question at issue between the Houses to overcome the difference between them by such a presumption from the face of the papers alone. But when by such a presumption from the face of the papers alone. But when we take a little broader view of the matter, and consider the stu-pendous wrong of disfranchising a State, and the more significant fact that but one return or certificate has been sent up from the State, that no other return is sent up, and no conflicting claim is presented by other certificates or returns, and the strong probability that such would have been presented had there been any ground for them, the probability is so strong that the one sent up is correct as to amount to a moral certainty; and it is very difficult to see how either House could honestly decide against its admission, and a dishonest decision of one House against its admission ought to be disregarded rather than to disfranchise the people of a State. These considerations seem to me to lead to the conclusion that in the great majority of cases of the kind justice would be much more likely to be reached by admitting the returns and counting the vote, when the two Houses disagree upon a single return from a State, than by excluding it; and that this conclusion is more in accordance with the tacit assumptions of the Constitution itself, which seems to assume that the vote is to be counted. I can, therefore, as at present advised, vote for the first section of the bill; and the more readily because it seems to me the same result would follow from the Constitution without the bill, and that the bill only embodies in a compact and authentic form the conclusions fairly resulting from the Constitution itself.

But I am far from being very confident of the correctness of this conclusion or the reasoning by which I have reached it, and may change my opinion entirely in the course of the discussion. The silence, the apparently utter hiatus in the Constitution, makes it very difficult to find any landmarks by which I can, with any confidence of certainty, guide my course. And I feel some of the same kind of uncertainty as I can imagine I might feel if thrown out into void space beyond sight of the stellar universe, and should there undertake to ascertain courses and distances and to divide that void space into definite areas. From such a position, so obscured by distance, I feel no strong confidence of being able to shed so strong a light upon the questions before us as to remove all the doubts of others or even my

But take now the case provided for by the second section of the bill, where there are two certificates or returns, or two sets showing the election of a different ticket or different men, one House deciding for one and the other for the other, and let us consider the question as it would stand upon the Constitution without the aid of this bill. If the two sets of returns were equally well authenticated, and other things being equal, (and a disagreement can hardly be supposed if they were not,) no such presumption would arise in their favor as in the case where there is but one return from a State; and the two Houses being divided in opinion, there is nothing to turn the scale in favor of either, what would be the result without this bill? Could the vote be counted? Certainly not; unless the President of the Senate is to decide, for otherwise there is no decision, and one cannot be counted unless both are counted; and if both are counted, they would neutralize each other, and the result would be the same as if

The Constitution has provided no tribunal for the decision upon such a disagreement, unless, as I have suggested, that by implication the President of the Senate is to make the decision. And if, as already suggested, there be any implication in the Constitution that the two Houses are to decide upon the validity of the returns or certificates, or that the President of the Senate is to decide it before or after the Houses have disagreed, then this implication, being as much a part of the Constitution as if expressed, it would be a violation of the Constitution for Congress to pass an act providing any other mode or tribunal for its decision.

It is only in the event that the Constitution has made no provision by implication, (for there is none expressed,) that it could be competent for Congress to establish a mode or tribunal for the decision. If there be no implication of any mode, and the Constitution can be said to have entirely omitted to provide for the decision, then perhaps it might be said the intention was to leave the mode of decision to the discretion of Congress. But the tribunal for this purpose must be one which can act and decide immediately upon the occurrence of the disagreement, for the Constitution evidently requires immediate decision.

If Congress can provide such a tribunal at all, it must be in their power to select that which in their opinion is best adapted to effect the object, a fair and speedy decision. But there are so many obvious objections to giving the power to the House of Representatives, voting by States, or to them with the two Senators of the State voting by States, and either of these methods is so obviously calculated to defeat the majority of the people of all the States interested, that I could in no event vote for any such tribunal. It would be far better to provide for a joint vote of the members and Senators of all the States, as in joint convention. But the insuperable objection to this would be that it would be in manifest violation of the affirmative provision of the Constitution, meager as that provision is; for in providing for the counting of the votes in the presence of the two Houses, the Constitution clearly enough indicates that it is not to be a joint convention, but that each House is to act in its separate capacity

Of all the modes suggested for the decision of the question, when the two Houses disagree, if there be power to establish any tribunal, I am most inclined to that suggested by the Senator from New Jersey, to call in the Chief Justice or one of the justices of the Supreme Court to act with the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate, and making the decision of the majority of these final. I think, however, it would be still better to call in the Chief Justice and the next senior justice, or, if there be no Chief Justice, then the two senior justices (according to date of commission) to act with the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, and making the decision of the majority of these four final. This would be certainly better and more likely to secure a fair and impartial decision when the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House happen to be of the same political party. But, for the reasons already suggested, I doubt the competency of Congress to provide any tribunal at all for the decision of such a question, and as yet incline to the opinion that the two Houses in their separate capacity are the tribunal of the Constitution, and I am inclined to think the only safe mode to remedy the evil is by an amendment of the Constitution itself.

But, with my present views, I have come to the conclusion to sup-port the present bill; but I am still open to conviction, and hope to derive more light from the discussion.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] said that it was incompetent to devolve this duty upon the justices of the Supreme Court; and his objection apparently seemed to be based upon the idea that it would be devolved upon them as a court. I do not understand this to be the fact, but it is only a mode of designating certain persons who are to act with the Speaker and with the President of the Senate. I am not sure that even that would be competent; but I wish to hear further discussion upon the subject.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The amendment which I offer is to add at the end of the second section these words:

The difference

Between the two Houses-

shall be immediately referred to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the presiding officer of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House, whose decision shall be final. If the Chief Justice is absent or unable to attend, the senior associate justice of the Supreme Court present in the capital or other place of meeting shall act in his place.

The word "capital" is printed "capital" instead of "capital." That correction should be made.

I was somewhat impressed by the argument made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Whyte] for the purpose of showing that the Constitution contemplated that the vote should be counted by the President of the Senate; but I am satisfied, on reviewing that subject, that my first impressions were correct, and that the Constitution does not contemplate that the President of the Senate should count the vote. The fact that the Constitution does in terms provide what duty the President of the Senate is to perform, to wit, that he is to open all the certificates, and omits to provide that he shall count the vote, I think is conclusive that it was not intended that he should do more than he is expressly authorized to do by the Constitution.

one examining the resolution of the convention that formed the Constitution, (passed September 17, 1787,) I think the Senator from Maryland gives it a misconstruction. That resolution had for its object the setting the wheels of this Government in motion, and after giving direction for the election of electors and having the certificates returned, the resolution provides:

That the Senators and Representatives should convene at the time and place assigned; and that the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President.

Or, to read it otherwise, "That the Senators shall have some person to preside for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President.'

It is true that by the Constitution the President of the Senate is to receive and open the votes; but the phraseology of this resolution is to be construed according to the well-known rule, "Reddendo singula singulis." The words of the resolution are to be taken singly, and the only intention of that resolution is that they shall have a presiding officer, in order that the votes may be received, opened, and counted, as provided in the Constitution.

The bill under consideration, as it stands, in effect says that when more than one return is made from any State and the two Houses disagree as to which is the true return, the vote of that State must be lost. Permit me to say to Senators that we all know that is a result that the Constitution did not contemplate. Whatever errors we may make in acting on this subject, we know that we commit an error if we enact a law leaving the election of the President in that position. It would be a great calamity to the country to have the will of the people defeated in the election of President by the failure to count people defeated in the election of President by the failure to count the vote of one State. It might lead to results that we do not even dare to contemplate. It is our duty to make such enactment that the vote of every State shall certainly be counted.

We must then take some action. The Constitution being silent, it is perhaps impossible to invoke its affirmative sanction for any plan that we may propose. No proposition can be put forward in support of which its advocates can turn to the Constitution and say, "Here is the positive authority for the proposition." The best that can be said for any plan is that it is not in violation of any provision of the Constitution. If I may have the attention of the Separar from Ohio. Constitution. If I may have the attention of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Thurman,] it seems to me that the plan which he favors comes near to being a violation of the Constitution. The Constitution has told us what part the House of Representatives shall take in the election of President, and we may not say that instrument intended that the House should take other or further action than that stated by it. It has declared and defined what shall be the province of the House in the election. It has said that if no person has a majority of the whole number of electors, then the House, voting by States, shall from those having the highest number, not exceeding three, choose a President. The Constitution has told us when and how the House of Representatives is to vote for President, and I think we have no right to assume that it contemplated that the House should vote in any other manner than is plainly stated in the Constitution.

We conclude that the President of the Senate is not to count the votes, because the Constitution says he is to open the votes, and does not say he is to count them. And by the same reasoning we conclude that the House is not to vote in the exigency we are contemplating. The Constitution declares when and how the House is to vote.

The amendment which I have proposed is not contrary to the Constitution, and the duty is on us to meet the difficulty in some way. The question to be submitted, and upon which a difference arises between the two Houses, is a judicial question. It is a question as to the authenticity of a return, and it is also undoubtedly a political question. It is no less a question than who shall be the Chief Magistrate of the nation; and the tribunal to make that determination should be one having judicial and political characteristics. The amendment suggests that it shall be the head of the judiciary, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House. Thus we have the repre-sentative of the States in the presiding officer of the Senate; the rep-resentative of the popular branch of the Legislature in the Speaker of the House of Representatives. They probably, in a difference between the House and the Senate, would in opinion represent their respective Houses, and being a judicial as well as a political question, we invoke the aid of the head of the judiciary. The high character of this tribunal, composed of men who have been selected by the nation, gives security against all partisan and all unjust decisions. Their determination would be made with the eyes of the nation upon them. The tribunal comports with the dignity of the great question, and would be safe and conservative; and I doubt whether it is possible to adopt

It is said that the votes are to be counted in the presence of the It is said that the votes are to be counted in the presence of the Senate and House. That is true, but the difficulty we are meeting is that of there being votes which they cannot count, where the Senate says, "Count them," and the House says, "Let them not be counted." Intervention thus becomes necessary. Therefore let us establish this tribunal, representing each House, and invoking the aid of the judiciary to determine what is the vote, that it may be counted in the presence of the two Houses.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The amendment offered by me is not properly printed. It purports to strike out all after the word "and" of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper] and insert my amendment. Instead of that it is to come in at the end of the second section of the bill, being an addition to that section. On the top of the second page of the printed amendment the word "voting" is omitted before "by States." Then, in order to perfect the amendment, I desire to add after the word "vote," in the fifth line on the second page, the words, "a majority of such representation shall cast the vote of the State."

The PRESIDING OFFCER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the nair.) The amendment will be reported as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the second ection of the bill the following:

If the Senate should vote for counting one certificate and the House of Representatives another, the joint meeting of the two Houses shall finally determine which shall be counted, voting by States, the representation from each State, including the Senators therefrom, having one vote. A majority of such representation shall cast the vote of the State, but if the representation of any State shall be equally divided its vote shall not be counted.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I suppose, although strictly speaking the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is the one before the Senate, it is not improper to consider all the amendments which are before the body. It seems to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee is liable to several objections. In the first place it provides for the decision of a question by one body where the two bodies disagree. In the event that the Senate should decide in favor of one set of returns and the House in favor of another, the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee provides that the question shall be decided by the vote of one of these bodies, excluding the vote of The amendment is objectionable in that respect, for in a the other. matter of disagreement in regard to the vote of a State each body should have a right to express their opinions and be heard. Each body should be allowed a vote in the final arbitrament of that question, and it should not be left exclusively to one of the two Houses to decide. That would be proper according to my view in any question arising between the two Houses, and it is rendered particularly proper in the consideration of this particular question.

The bill is one relating to the election of both President and Vice-President. The first and second sections refer to counting the votes for both officers; but the second section especially says that the returns of the election for President and Vice-President in such States shall be opened by the Vice-President "in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes." And the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee proposes a mode of settling a disputed question in regard to the election of both officers.

The twelfth article of the Constitution of the United States declares that where there has been no election by the people the House of Representatives shall elect the President and the Senate of the United States shall elect the Vice-President. We are now considering a measure in regard to the election of both these officers, not the President only, but the President and Vice-President also. The bill is applicable to both of these officers, and we must therefore frame a law so as to be operative as to each of those officers, and not to one alone, and that shall not deprive either body of its constitutional right. While the Constitution declares that the Vice-President shall be elected, in the event that there is no election by the people, by the Senate of the United States, the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee pros to take away entirely from the Senate any voice in his election. I think, therefore, that the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is liable to the fatal objection that it deprives the very body which the Constitution itself provided shall decide that question of any choice in the matter.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?
Mr. JOHNSTON. Certainly.
Mr. EATON. Does the logic of the Senator's argument carry it to the extent that under certain circumstances a President might be elected of one party and a Vice-President of another party?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I think not, under the amendment I propose.

Mr. EATON. I speak of the logic of the argument, not of the words of the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I think that the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee has great weight. He suggested that in times of high party excitement, times which lead not only men but public bodies from what they might do in cooler moments, the House of Representatives might attempt to usurp the functions of the Senate by intentionally differing from the Senate. Take the case of the two Houses being under the control of two different political parties. A question arises in which the Senate votes one way and the House another. Then in in which the Senate votes one way and the House another. Then in the face of a disagreement between those two bodies the House under the small part of the Senate votes. der the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee would have a right to determine the whole question. That might be an inducement to the House to differ from the Senate in order that they might thus be the House to differ from the Senate in order that they might thus be enabled to exercise this whole important function. It seems to me that we ought not to put any such power as that in the hands of any-body; that we ought not by adopting such an amendment to enable the House of Representatives by differing designedly from the Senate to acquire the right and power to decide the question themselves to the exclusion of the other body. Therefore that amendment is objectionable on that account.

Nor do I think the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is the prepare solution of this question. I believe that the Constitution the proper solution of this question. I believe that the Constitution intended in the beginning that Congress should decide these questions. I do not think it was ever contemplated by the framers of that instrument, or that it is in accordance with its spirit, that any-body or any set of men but the Congress should decide these very important questions; yet the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey calls in an entirely new body, one not recognized at all by the Constitution, a body to be created now by law, never thought of at the time the Constitution was framed, having its whole existence in this proposed law and originating on this particular occasion. Such a body is no part of the regular Government of the United States, but is a new body to be brought into existence for the first time

I respectfully suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that the Speaker of the House, as such, is not recognized in the Constitution in regard to the count of the votes for President and Vice-President, but is only a member of the House. He performs no function; he does nothing more than any other member of the body and has no greater power. He is ignored in the Constitution. When they meet in joint assembly the President of the Senate presides over the body. The Speaker does not preside. He is there as a member of the House but not as Speaker of the House. He has nothing to do, therefore, beyond any other member of the House on that occasion, and the selection of him to discharge any important duty as Speaker is therefore outside of the original purpose of the Constitution, and if he has to have any especial powers they have to be given to him now. The same is true in regard to the appointment of the Chief Justice as a member of this new tribunal. That was never contemplated by the Constitution. It was intended in the beginning that any questions which might arise on this matter should be decided by Congress alone, and by nobody else. If we adopt the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey we create a body of men who are to act when the circumstances arise, who have been contemplated by no previous law, by nothing in the Constitution of the United States itself, and who are to solve and settle a question which according to my view the Constitu-tion intended Congress itself to settle.

vide for a contingency in which there may be two returns from a State when the question arises as to which of those returns shall be counted. All agree that nobody in the beginning contemplated, and no one contemplates now, that the fair vote of a State should be excluded. The right of every State to vote lies at the very bottom of our consti-tutional rights. If it is ever conceded that a contingency may arise in which the fair vote of a State shall be excluded, then we at once lay a foundation for the destruction of our Government. The Constitution intended that not only the votes of one State or two States should be counted, but that the votes of all the States should be counted; every State; not nineteen out of twenty, not thirty-six out of thirty-seven, but the whole thirty-seven. Each and every State has a right to have its vote counted in the election of President and Vice-President. Therefore, this being a fundamental right lying at the very foundation of our Government, it is imperative on us to find. some mode to provide against a contingency which may defeat the vote of a State. What seems to have been the original purpose of the vote of a State. What seems to have been the original purpose of the Constitution? It appears to me there can be no doubt on that sub-It does not seem that there was any idea, either in the framers of the Constitution or in the Constitution itself, that anybody could exercise that right except the Congress of the United States. The Constitution provides that where there is no election by the people the House of Representatives shall elect the President, and where there is no election by the people the Senate shall elect the Vice-President. It provides that the two bodies shall meet in joint session. The joint convention shall separate only for certain specified purposes, namely, where questions arise to be decided-touching any return. In that case the two bodies are to separate and each shall decide for itself. There may be a contingency in which the two bodies acting separately may differ. One may decide in favor of one set of returns and rately may differ. One may decide in favor of one set of returns and the other in favor of another. It does not seem to me that the powers of the Congress of the United States are insufficient to provide for a contingency of that sort. The fact being admitted that it is the duty of Congress to provide for the counting of every vote of a State, (and that fact cannot be disputed,) if the Constitution itself fails to provide for the mode of doing this, can there be any doubt of the power of Congress, under the general section read by the Senator from Ohio, to provide for this emergency? If the machinery is not provided by the Constitution itself, the power to provide that machinery is given to Congress. The Constitution says that the votes of the States shall be counted. If it omits to provide how it may be done in each and every emergency when an unexpected difficulty arises, under its general power Congress can give each State its vote, in order to preserve the spirit of our institutions. The Constitution in substance allows the two bodies together by law to provide a mode in which that difficulty shall be removed and that the vote of that State shall be counted. The question is What mode is most in constitution with the calculation. The question is, What mode is most in consonance with the spirit of the Constitution? What did the Constitution intend in the beginning? What did the framers of the Constitution intend? What mode is most likely to be the one which was originally intended, and which would carry out the spirit and intention of the Constitution most effectually?

As the Constitution has mentioned no other body but Congress, as there is no reference anywhere in the instrument to this duty being there is no reference anywhere in the instrument to this duty being performed by any body but Congress, whenever we go outside of Congress to get any man, or any set of men, for the purpose of deciding this question, we go outside of the spirit of the instrument, and outside of its letter. The right course to pursue is to see what the spirit of the instrument is, what was intended in the beginning, what the purpose of it was, that whatever remedy we do adopt we may adopt the one nearest to the spirit of the instrument. The amendment proposed by myself answers that end. Here is a law providing how the certificates as to the election of the President and the Vice-President, two great officers, shall be determined. We have to count the returns for both, and we must provide by law for counting them both. Then in attempting to do that we must look to see what the Constitution intended. It is clear that the Constitution intended that, in a certain contingency, the election of President should be settled by the House and the election of Vice-President should be settled by the House and the election of vice-President should be settled by this body. To propose that the House should have the complete right to settle both these questions is not in conformity with the spirit of the Constitution. I cannot see that there is any other solution of the question. If we adopt any other we go outside of the letter and outside of the spirit of the Constitution, and, therefore, it seems to me that the amendment proposed by myself is the only proper solution.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I would not trouble the Senate with any remarks at this time if it were not for the fact that I hold some impressions upon this question which I have not heard yet expressed by any Senator who has preceded me in the debate. I speak of them as impressions rather than as a belief; but, whether they are one or the other, they are so strong upon me that I think it worth while for me to give them to the Senate.

I agree with all other Senators that this is one of the most important pieces of legislation that I have seen before this body since I have had the honor of a seat here; and I may be allowed to say that to me it is altogether the saddest piece of legislation. It is to me, as It is a longer the saddest piece of legislation. It is to me, as I doubt not it is to the Senate at large and the country as well, a melancholy reflection that we should at this early period of our history require additional legislation, special legislation, in order to execute properly the very simple trust which the Constitution confided to the States and to the Congress of the United States. When the constitutional convention, after a great deal of discussion, after prolonged deliberation, finally invented the plan of having the States make known their choice for President through an electoral college, and had declared to that end that they might appoint a prescribed number of electors in any way the Legislature of the State thought best, I do not think it was contemplated by any one member of that convention that it would ever be a doubtful question, in fact, among honest men who had been appointed by the Legislature of any given State. When the convention said that at a given time the two Houses of Congress should be convened together, and that there the votes which had been returned from the different States should be spread open, and, in the presence of all the members of Congress, those votes should be counted, I do not think it ever entered into the mind of one member of that convention to suppose that a difficulty should ever arise in that joint convention as to which missive purporting to come from a State should be respected as the message of that State. already we know historically that that convention was overconfident either as to the sagacity or the integrity of the men who were to come afterward. Questions of great difficulty have already arisen; and this bill, as well as all the amendments proposed to it, is full of prophecy that like difficulties may occur hereafter. If such difficulties are to come, we ought to deliberate very carefully and very conscientional to the company to the compa tiously how we can best avoid them, or how we can best meet them and deal with them if they must arise.

I have given undoubtedly much less attention to this subject than

I have given undoubtedly much less attention to this subject than I ought to have done. I will say right here, however, that, upon such consideration as I have bestowed upon the subject, if I am called upon to choose between the different expedients already laid upon our desks, I should prefer myself the provisions of the bill reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections to any of the amendments which have been offered. Before telling why, I want to make another preliminary remark; and that is, that I am one of those who supposed that all the power of every kind which the constitutional convention intended should ever be everyfully the Covernment of the United intended should ever be exercised by the Government of the United States that convention vested in one or the other of the three departments which it created under this Constitution; and I cannot help feeling to-day that there is no power which the Government can exercise which is not in its nature legislative, executive, or judicial. If it be executive, it belongs to the executive department of the Government in express terms by the Constitution. If it be legislative, it belongs to the Congress of the United States, to the legislative department of the Government, in express terms by the Constitution. the contrary, it be judicial in its nature, it belongs to the judicial department of the Government, as fixed by the Constitution; it does not wait for an act of Congress to vest it there; it does not need a not wait for an act of Congress to vest it there; it does not need a tribunal or that you pass an act of Congress for it.

Is this power executive in its nature? What is the power that you propose to exert? Briefly this: There is the State of Rhode Island, which is entitled to four votes upon the election of your next President and Vice-President. I suppose the Legislature of that State has provided that those electors shall be chosen by the people, or does the Legislature arroint them itself?

the Legislature appoint them itself?

Mr. ANTHONY. They are chosen by the people.

Mr. HOWE. Suppose it shall so happen that next autumn there comes to the President of the Senate a letter from Rhode Island signed by four men who claim to be the electors of the State, and who say by four men who claim to be the electors of the State, and who say that they voted for Brown for President and Wilkins for Vice-President, and that there shall come another letter from the same State, signed by four gentlemen claiming also to be electors of that same State, saying that they voted for two other and different people. Or, to suggest another case which presents precisely the same difficulty, suppose there come two letters from the State of Rhode Island signed precisely the same, but one letter says that the State of Rhode Island voted for Brown and Wilkins and the other letter says that it voted for two different men. There the question is presented. In the first case, you know that everybody voted; that one set of those fellows who claim to be elected is absolutely the right set. In the other case, everybody knows that one of those letters is a forgery. One is true, You want to ascertain how to determine in the one the other is false. case which of the letters is the true letter and which is the lorged, or, in the other case, which set of four men was legally authorized by the State of Rhode Island to declare its wishes in the presidential what is the nature of that question? What is the election. Now, what is the nature of that question? What is the nature of the power which determines that question? If executive, clearly the President should determine it; but then no one will say that it is executive, or at least no one has yet said that. Well, is it legislative? This bill, and each one of the amendments, and all the discussion to which I have listened seem to go upon the supposition that it is legislative power. If it be, I wish Senators would consider for a moment whether they can abdicate, transfer, transmit the exercise of that power to any other body in the world. The Constitution says that legislative power is vested in a Senate made so and so, and in a House of Representatives made exactly so, and in no other way. Those two bodies, under the correction of the President, are to wield all legislative power, and for the very gravest reasons in the world the Constitution vested this legislative power in these very peculiarly constituted bodies. Now, can you delegate the exercise of any part of legislative power to any other tribunal? I simply state the question. I do not argue it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And do not answer it.
Mr. HOWE. No; I do not answer it. I will give my own opinion.
My own opinion is that it cannot be delegated; and therefore if I were driven to the conclusion that the decision of this grave question, this momentous question, this question upon which, under conditions entirely conceivable, may hang the issues of civil war—if I were driven to the conclusion that that is a legislative question, I should say that, when the question arises which one of these letters from Rhode Island shall be respected as the voice of Rhode Island, it must be settled either by the joint convention or by the several Houses acting separately; nor can it be left to arbitration, no matter who may be the arbitrators. There is but one way under the Constitution in which it can be settled, and that is by bill, going through all the forms of enactment, becoming a law by the approval of the President of the United States, or receiving the vote of two-thirds of each House over his veto. That is my own conclusion. I do not propose to argue it, and I do not propose to occupy the attention of the Senate any longer than to make one other suggestion—probably it already occurs to so many Senators as have done me the honor of listening to me—and that is that in my own mind the power which can definitely settle that question, conclusively settle that question which letter reflects the voice of Rhode Island, is not the exercise of executive power, is not the exercise of legislative power, but is the exercise

Who are interested in that question? If those four votes would change the political complexion of the executive department of the Government for four years, it is a question which interests certainly all the political parties into which the people of the United States may be divided; and in that sense it interests all the people of the United States. Nay, the political complexion of these parties may assume a hue, a color which would make the great issues of peace and assume a flue, a color which would make the great issues of peace and war with foreign powers actually to depend upon the question which of those letters actually represents the will of Rhode Island. But then there are two or more persons who have a peculiar and a pecuniary interest in that question. Who are they? The men who are rival candidates for the Presidency. Count one of those letters true, and one man becomes President of the United States; count the other, and another becomes the President of the United States. Now, is the Presidency under our system of government an office or is it not? If it be an office, why is not the selection of men to fill it as jealously guarded and as jealously controlled as the selection of men to fill any other office? If the dispute be about the choice of a municipal officer, the sheriff of a county, or anything of that sort, and a question arises before the board of county canvassers, or whatever they may be called, as to which of two letters from a certain town contains the true vote as to which of two letters from a certain town contains the true vote of that town, that question, everybody knows, I suppose, at this day, is under the government of all our States plainly a judicial question. The courts have so held over and over again; and in one instance to my knowledge it has been held that a dispute between two contending candidates for the office of governor of a State was a question to be settled by the judicial tribunals of the State. The sitting governor, the occupying governor, has been ousted from office, and another man has been invested with the office under the judgment of a court of law. In what respect, except in point of mere dignity, does court of law. In what respect, except in point of mere dignity, does the office of President differ from the office of governor?

If, then, this be a judicial question, it belongs of course to the courts of the United States. The Senator from Ohio says that the Supreme Court cannot take original jurisdiction of the question. He is undoubtedly right about that, for the very good reason that it is not one of the questions nominated in the Constitution over which the Supreme Court has original jurisdiction; but, if it is a judicial question in its nature and a question which arises under the Constitution of the United States, it belongs to some court of the United States, that which has original jurisdiction. Does it arise under the Constitution of the United States? What does the Constitution say? Not contemplating that there may be any dispute, that there may be any two pretenders to the office of elector of a State, it says these two things: First, that when the two Houses get together the votes given by the States shall be counted; and you do not obey the command of the Constitution by anything short of that; no matter what the dispute may be, no matter what the difficulty may be of determining what are the votes of the State, the command of the Constitution is explicit that the votes shall be counted. What more? It says this other thing, that the man who has the majority of the votes shall be President; not the man whom the president of the convention shall assert has the majority; not the man whom the joint convention shall say has the majority; not the man whom the two Houses shall say; not the man to whom it may be awarded by any arbitration that may be possibly manufactured, but the man who has the majority. He is the man upon whom the Constitution, which we are all sworn to support, devolves the office of President. Therefore I think, myself, that by the express letter of the Constitution this question is a judicial question, and all the legislation you want is such as may simplify and expedite the trial and the determination of it.

plify and expedite the trial and the determination of it.

I know very well that it does not matter at all who decides this question which may arise in the States touching the vote of a State, if after all the vote which the State really gave is counted in the convention and goes into the summing up of the general result, no matter who gets it, whether the president of the convention, the Speaker of the House, the Clerk, or any member; but, if there is a dispute as to which is the true vote, then it has to be decided by somebody. I admit, if you leave it to the president of the convention, he may decide it wrong; if you leave it to the two Houses, they may; if you leave it to any of the tribunals suggested by the different amendments, they may decide it wrong; and I admit, if you ent amendments, they may decide it wrong; and I admit, if you leave it to the judicial tribunals, they may decide it wrong; and so, after all, the command of the Constitution may not be obeyed, and the true vote of a State may be rejected and a false vote substituted.

But the two reasons why I conclude that this power belongs to the courts, and to nobody else, are: First, I think it is judicial power in its nature, and so has gone by the express delegation of the Constitution to the courts, and, secondly, if I were myself, instead of being a Senator, a full-fledged constitutional convention, and were making a constitution upon this point, I would delegate this power to the courts; not because they cannot blunder or be dishonest even as well as other tribunals, but because they have less excuse for blundering and are under greater obligations to be honest than most other tribunals, the forms of procedure in the courts are so deliberate, both parties are so carefully heard, testimony is so fully adduced, and the opportunity is given for so careful a weighing of it, and they act before the whole world, their judgments are submitted to the criticisms not merely of the present generation but of all time. So, as I was about to say, if I were making a constitution, I should take pains in most explicit terms to give this authority to the courts.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, there are three propositions here as amendments to the second section of this bill. That section provides for a case where there are two returns of electoral votes from the same State, and further provides that only that return which both Houses agree is the true and valid return shall be counted.

The first amendment, that offered by the Senator from Tennessee. The first amendment, that offered by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Cooper,] is that in case the two Houses do not agree upon the same return the question shall then be referred to the House of Representatives, and they shall vote by States, and that return which has a majority of the States represented in the House shall be counted. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. Johnston] proposes to amend that by providing for a joint convention of the two Houses, the Senators and Representatives to meet together and compose one body, but that in that capacity, each Senator and each Representative having one vote, the vote shall again be taken by States. For example, the State of Delaware would have three votes in this joint convention, having of Delaware would have three votes in this joint convention, having two Senators and one Representative. The two Senators would cast the vote of the State, or one Senator and one Representative could cast the vote of the State, or one senator and one representative contacts the vote of the State. In other words, it is proposed to give the Senators a vote in the determination of the voice of the State, just as a member of the other House would have in the election of President.

The third proposition is submitted by the Senator from New Jersey

The third proposition is submitted by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Frelinghuysen] to provide that, in case of disagreement of the two Houses in determining which is the valid return, then the question shall be referred to the decision of the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House, acting together with the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court; that they shall constitute a tribunal. Of these three propositions, that of the Senator from New Jersey is, in my opinion, much the best. It is much more fair, equitable, and republican then either of the others in my independ lican than either of the others, in my judgment.

But, sir, I now present the question as to whether you can constitute an umpire between these two Houses. In the first place, to go back to the main proposition, the Constitution declares that—

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

Two constructions are contended for here. One is that the President of the Senate himself shall open and count the votes and shall determine all questions arising upon the certificates or, in case there are two certificates, shall decide which is the true and valid return. That is one construction claimed. There is another that the duty of the President of the Senate is simply to open the certificates in the presence of the two Houses; that the two Houses are assembled not as a joint convention, but each in its separate capacity; that they are as a joint convenient, the sees in the separate capacity, that they are there not only as witnesses, but they are there as judges; and if a question arises in regard to the vote of a State or a part of it, it is to be settled by the two Houses who are present there as the judges of the election.

We could, without doing any great violence to the Constitution, adopt either of these constructions. Each is possible under the language. The Constitution says:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

It does not say who shall count them; it leaves it open to inference that they shall be counted by the two Houses on the one hand or by the President of the Senate on the other. I will assume; for the sake of the argument, that you can give to it either construction. I will assume that it is open to both views. Then the question comes, which is the more reasonable, which is the better, which is the safer of the two: to adopt that construction which gives this great power to one man, the President of the Senate, who may be counting the votes for himself, as it has turned out six times in our history; or would it be safer to leave it to the determination of the two Houses of Congress, representing the States and the people? If we are open to adopt either one of these constructions, I say the latter is the safer, it is the more reasonable, it is in conformity with the spirit of our Government and of popular institutions. I then adopt the latter construction.

If the votes are to be counted by the two Houses, a disagreement arising, how shall that be settled? In the first place the first section of this bill provides for the case where there is but one certificate, where there is but one set of electoral votes; there is no question that that certificate does come from the State; but it may be defective. For example, it may not state that the electors voted by ballot, as the Constitution requires; it may not show that separate lists were made, as the Constitution requires; it may not show that the vote was cast on the day the law requires; or it may not be properly authenticated by the governor, according to form. There may be doubts upon these questions; but still, the return itself being admitted to be the only one from the State, that section of the bill provides that the return shall be counted unless both Houses concur in saying that some one of these objections is so clear as to require its rejection. That part of it is safe enough. There is only one return; the authenticity of it is admitted, but there is some defect about it. That defect shall not reject the return unless it is so plain that both Houses concur in rejecting it. That is safe for the country.

We then come to the case where there are two sets of electoral votes—two certificates, and each on its face is prima facie the vote of the State. How, then, shall it be determined? I assume that the Senate is acting patriotically and honestly; I assume that the House would act in the same way. They may be composed of different parties, but we must leave something to the integrity of men, no difference by what political name they may be called. There are two sets. The Senate resolves in favor of one set, the House resolves in favor of the other set. There is a disagreement. The Senator from Ohio said that it was the intention that the State should have a vote, and so I say. The intention is that the State should have a vote, but if the thing is in that condition that Congress cannot determine which is the correct vote, it will be the misfortune of the State if the vote is lost. That is all you can say about it. It is like any other case where the tribunal cannot agree. Appropriation bills are absolutely necessary to carry on this Government; and yet if the two Houses cannot agree about them the bills are lost. It is the misfor-tune of the Government; it may be the destruction of the Government, but you cannot create an umpire in that case to pass an appropriation bill and determine whether the appropriation shall be made.

Mr. SARGENT. It is because the Constitution prohibits it in that case. Does the Constitution prohibit it in the other?

Mr. MORTON. I do not know that the Constitution prohibits it in that case any more than it prohibits it in the other. It provides that all the powers of this Government shall be in the three departments, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial; and when the judicial cannot agree and fails to act, that is the end of it; and so with the legislative. I know of no provision in the Constitution authorizing you to create an umpire between the two Houses in regard to this question any more than in regard to a legislative question. Take a case where there are eight judges on the bench of the Su-preme Court, an even number, and they stand four and four. They have failed to act. The judgment of the court below may be affirmed because the judgment of the court above is equally divided, or where affirmative action is positively required, as in the case of a mandate, the judges being equally divided, it falls. You cannot provide for an umpire in that case to come in and settle the question in case of a division of the Supreme Court.

Now I want to consider very briefly the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee providing that in case the two Houses of Congress shall disagree, then the House of Representatives, voting by States, shall settle the question. I would say to my friend that I am opposed to that upon every ground; first, because it is inequitable, it is unjust, and I can see no logical propriety in taking a vote by States in determining a question of that kind as to which may be the true return from a State. There it may be a question arising upon the certificate, or possibly, though I cannot see how, a question of fact out-States seems to me to be illogical in every respect. It recognizes a principle to which I am unalterably opposed. We have got one vote principle to which I am unalterably opposed. We have got one vote by States in the Constitution. That is enough. I undertake to say by States in the Constitution. That is enough. I undertake to say it is to-day the most dangerous provision in that instrument, and it ought to be out of it. It has been exercised but twice, and each time it brought the Government into great danger. The idea now of giving to the House of Representatives the power of voting by States to disfranchise a State, or to admit this return or that return, the effect of which might be to give to the House itself the election of a Pres-ident, or to give the election to that candidate who had a majority of States in his favor voting by States in the House, but to whom a large majority of that House personally might be opposed, is too dangerous to be tolerated. I have already shown by a calculation which has been made that you may take the present House of Representatives and out of two hundred and ninety-two members forty-five members can elect a President against the wishes of nearly two hundred and fifty, and that nineteen States having less than a population of eight millions can elect a President over the other States having a population of thirty-two millions.

Sir, if I had the time I could go into the history of the election of President in the House of Representatives in 1801 to show that it presents the most powerful temptation to corruption of any process connected with our whole Government; and if it were not for shocking the sensibilities of men, if it were not that I might detract something from that reverence which time has cast upon certain characters, I might refer to the history of that election to show that perhaps it was the most corrupt election in the history of our Government. I referred this morning to an old document that I remembered to have seen some time ago, and I read from a speech made by Mr. Bayard, of Delaware, in February, 1802, in regard to the election by the House of Representatives in 1801, a speech made in Congress by one who participated in that election. I will ask the Clerk to read from where I have marked on page 417 to page 420 of the volume, Debates on the Judiciary, which I send to the desk. The Chief Clerk read as follows:

In have marked on page 417 to page 420 of the volume, Debates on the Judiciary, which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The case, sir, to which I refer carries me once more to the scene of the presidential election. I should not have introduced it into this debate had it not been called up by the honorable member from Virginia. In that scene I had my part; it was a part not barren of incident, and which has left an impression which cannot easily depart from my recollection. I know who were rendered important characters, either from the possession of personal means or from the accident of political situation. And now, sir, let me ask the honorable member what his reflections and belief will be when he observes that every man on whose voot the event of the election hung has since been distinguished by presidential favor. I fear, sir, I shall violate the electron of parliamentary proceeding in the mentioning of names; but I hope the example which has been set me will be admitted as an excuse. Mr. Charles Pinchney, of South Carolina, was not a member of the House, but he was one of the most active, efficient, and successful promoters of the election of the present Chief Magistrate. It was well ascertained that the votes of South Carolina were to turn the equal balance of the scales. The zeal and industry of Mr. Pinckney had no bounds. The doubtful politics of South Carolina were decided, and her votes east into the scales of Mr. Jefferson. Mr. Pinckney has since been appointed minister plenipotentially to the court of Madrid; an appointment as high and honorable as any within the gift of the Executive. I will not deny that this preferment is the reward of talents and services, although, sir, I have never yet heard of the talents or services of Mr. Charlos Pinckney. In the House of Representatives I know what was the value of the vote of Mr. Linn, of New Jersey. The delegation of the State was in his hands. Mr. Claiborne has since been raised to the high dignity of governor of the Mississippi Te competition for the presidential office, of deciding the election in his favor.

Mr. MORTON. That extract from a speech of Mr. Bayard showing very clearly that the election of President by the House of Representatives or the decision of any question referred to that House where the vote was to be taken by States would be within the reach of the patronage of the President, proves the danger of that form of election. Aside from all questions of unfairness, aside from giving to the smallest State in this Union, with a population of not one hundred thousand, the same voice in the selection of a Chief Magistrate or in determining some question upon which that election turns that the great State of New York has with nearly five million people, such a plan of election is a strain upon popular government in this country to which our institutions ought never to be subjected again, if possible. There are other features connected with that election that I might refer to, going to show the same thing; but coming down to the election of John Quincy Adams, Mr. Clay, one of the most distinguished members who has ever had a seat in this body, long the great leader of his party, as a member of the House of Representatives voted for Mr. Adams when the election went to the House; and afterward being appointed Secretary of State, he had a stigma affixed upon him from which he never escaped through a long and honorable life.

The proposition of my friend from Virginia as well as that of my friend from Tennessee recognizes this principle of the independence and the sovereignty of the States, thus subdividing the nation, and giving to each one a voice in the settlement and determination of this question—a principle which in its amplification and in its consequences was the foundation of the doctrine of secession, and has quences was the foundation of the doctrine of secession, and has brought upon this country the greatest evils under which it has suffered. I can never consent, so far as I am concerned, to vote for any bill that further extends the operation of that doctrine.

If we have power at all, which I do not think we have, to create an umpire to decide where the two Houses disagree, I then submit to my friend from New Jersey as well as to all the Senate, that the safest and best proposition is to introduce the Supreme Court in that case. If upon the question of a vote of a State that may turn a presidential election the House and the Senate cannot agree, the country would not be so well satisfied with a decision made by the country would not be so well satisfied with a decision made by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House and the Chief Justice, a special tribunal, as it would with a decision made by the Supreme Court of the United States. If we can call in an outside tribunal, one already existing, or if we can create one, would not the Supreme Court of the United States be more satisfactory to this nation than any other one whose services we could invoke? And if, as the Senator from Ohio argued, you cannot confer the power upon the Supreme Court, because there can be no appellate jurisdiction conferred upon that court that does not come from an inferior court, as there could not be an appeal taken from the Court of Claims until you first gave the Court of Claims the power of finding a judgment— if he is technically right about that, if we cannot call in the Supreme Court as a supreme court to decide that question, still we can do this, and I invite the attention of Senators to this: If we can make a special tribunal out of the Speaker of the House, the President of the Senate, and the Chief Justice, we can make a special tribunal to consist of the judges of the Supreme Court. I have therefore drawn up the form of a proposition, if it be the pleasure of the Senate to establish an umpire, which I will read—it is not in order now, but I will read it for information—and I avoid the technical difficulty suggested by the Senator from Ohio, that you cannot confer this power on the Supreme Court as a supreme court, but keeping in mind the other suggestion, that we can create a special tribunal, then I say we can make that special tribunal to consist as well of the judges of the Supreme Court as of the Speaker of the House, the President of the Supreme Court as of the Speaker of the House, the President of the Senate, and the Chief Justice.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to suggest to him—and I make the suggestion to the Senator from New Jersey as well—might not this question come before the Supreme Court of the United States as a judicial question, as much, for instance, as in the case of Marbury vs. Madison? I can very well understand how a judicial question involving this election might come before the Supreme Court in its judicial character; and it seems to me an objection, therefore, to make them decide, or at least the Chief Justice to decide it, not as a judicial question, when he may be after Justice to decide it, not as a judicial question, when he may be afterward called upon to decide it judicially.

Mr. MORTON. I think this question cannot come before the Supreme Court judicially; certainly not under the present law that we have; but I will now read the plan of the amendment that I would suggest in case the Senate determines that we have the power to es-

That the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States shall be assembled in the chamber of the Supreme Court at the same time that the two Houses of Congress are counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President; and in case the two Houses shall fail to agree as to which is the true and valid return as provided for in this section, the returns shall be immediately submitted to the said judges, who shall summarily decide which is the true and valid return, which return shall be counted.

It seems to me that, if we have got to refer this question to anybody, it would be more satisfactory to refer it to the Supreme Court of the United States; and if you cannot do it in the character of Su-preme Court, then let your special tribunal be composed of judges of that court, and let them decide it, and decide it forthwith.

My opinion is that there is a defect in the Constitution. I think this whole electoral-college business ought to be destroyed. The purpose of it has failed utterly. It is entirely useless; it is dangerous; but until that amendment is made, my opinion is you cannot do better than to take this bill substantially as it has been reported to this body.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I think it quite obvious that we cannot conclude this discussion to-night. It has been valuable to us all, and the question is of so great importance that reflection upon what has been said I have no doubt will be advantageous to each Senator. I move therefore that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of

Mr. RANDOLPH. Before that motion is put I should like to bring I submitted an amendment which seems to have escaped the attention of most of the Senate, the reason being that it was then out of order and that it was not printed with the other amendments. I should like to have the amendment that I proposed laid before the Senate, in order that it, with the others, may be discussed.

Mr. MORTON. It has been printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will come up in due time.

Mr. RANDOLPH. But it was printed on a separate slip, and during the whole discussion it has not entered into consideration as one ing the whole discussion it has not entered into consideration as one of the amendments that might possibly be adopted.

Mr. MORTON. I overlooked it. I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the printed amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.]

The CHIEF CLERK., The proposed amendment is to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. —. Should the two Houses of Congress, acting separately, fail to agree as to which is the true and valid return of a State, then, and in that event only, the President of the Senate shall render a decision of the question, and such rendition shall be in favor of that return of a State which shall have received a majority of all the votes cast in both Houses of Congress, considered as if both Houses had cast their votes in joint meeting assembled.

Mr. MORTON. I will ask to have the amendment which I suggested

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The suggested amendment will be

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States shall be assembled in the chamber of the Supreme Court at the same time that the two Houses of Congress are counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, and in case the two Houses shall fail to agree as to which is the true and valid return as provided for in this section, the returns shall be immediately submitted to the said judges, who shall summarily decide which is the true and valid return, which return shall be counted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment will also be printed. Mr. EDMUNDS. I renew my motion for an executive session. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at three o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 16, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution and bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 65) authorizing Edwin James, consular agent at San José, to accept a piece of plate from the Queen of Great Britain;

An act (H. R. No. 83) for the relief of James A. Hile, of Lewis County, Missouri;

An act (H. R. No. 215) granting a pension to John G. Parr, of Kittanning, Pennsylvania;
An act (H. R. No. 811) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1877; and An act (H. R. No. 1599) granting a pension to Frances C. Elliott.

ARMING AND EQUIPMENT OF THE MILITIA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication and accompanying papers from the Chief of Ordnance, relative to the arming and equipment of the militia of the United States and the laws pertaining thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LOSS OF CLOTHING OF ENLISTED MEN.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the proceedings of a board of survey, convened at Omaha Barracks, Nebraska, on the loss of clothing of certain enlisted men of the Twenty-third Infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the proceedings of the boards of survey convened on clothing lost by certain enlisted men of the Twentieth Infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES IN PITTSBURGH CUSTOM-HOUSE.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 13th instant, copies of letters made the basis of an investigation recently made into alleged irregularities in the management of the custom-house at Pittsburgh; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again inquire this morning whether there be objection to the presentation for appropriate reference of bills on the Speaker's table?

There was no objection.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The following Senate bills on the Speaker's table were severally read a first and second time and referred to committees, as follows: A bill (S. No. 4) for the relief of William Bowlin-to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 43) granting a pension to Urial Bundy—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. No. 130) to relinquish the interests of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

of California—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 545) granting a pension to Abraham Ellis—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 2) authorizing Rear-Admiral J. J. Almy, United States Navy, to accept a decoration from the King of the Hawaiian Islands—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 546) to further the administration of justice in the State of Colorado—to the Committee on the Territories.

A bill (S. No. 229) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of said constitution and State government, and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States—to the Committee on the Territories.

A bill (S. No. 509) for the relief of John A. Shaw-to the Committee

A bill (H. R. No. 1251) to exclude the State of Missouri from the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to premote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872, with amendments.

Mr. BLAND. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in and a conference asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

A bill (S. No. 575) for the relief of Elias E. Hovey-to the Committee of Ways and Means.
A bill (S. No. 561) for the relief of Major Junius T. Turner—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 560) for the relief of Benjamin L. Cornish, late second lieutenant of the Thirty-second Wisconsin Volunteer Infantryto the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 401) to incorporate the Citizens' Building Company of Washington, District of Columbia-to the Committee for the District

A bill (S. No. 391) to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase a portion of land on the island of Key West, Florida—to the Coma portion of land on the island of Key West, Florida—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. No. 384) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza Potter, widow of Lorenzo T. Potter, deceased, late of Charleston, South Carolina—to the Committee on Military Affairs; and

A bill (S. No. 333) for the relief of Major A. Hixon, late a paymaster in the Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REFERENCE OF PAPERS

The SPEAKER. The Clerk of the House calls the attention of the Chair to the facts which will now be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The following papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule without indorsement thereon of any member's name or the committees to which they are desired to be referred:

The remonstrance of William P. Clyde and others against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 523) authorizing vessels built abroad, but belonging wholly to citizens of the United States, to be registered as vessels of the United States.

The remonstrance of Van Brunt Brothers and 41 others, of a similar import.

The remonstrance of Elias A. Chambers and 20 others, of similar import.

A petition for the improvement of the Snake River

A petition of the citizens of Ashley, for the relief of Edward O. M. Condon.

A petition of William Wheeler Hubbell, accompanied with a plan to establish a commercial money currency, &c., to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that all the papers which have been read shall be referred to the appropriate committees. It appears that they did not have upon them either the name of the member presenting them or where he wishes them to be referred; but, by unanimous consent, they can receive the appropriate reference.

The SPEAKER. It will be so ordered unless objection be made, and they will be referred to the appropriate committees; and the Chair hears no objection. The Chair made this statement at the suggestion of the Clerk, for the purpose of reminding gentlemen of the importance of observing these little matters of form in the indorsement of papers and their proper reference.

ELECTION CONTEST-COX VS. STRAIT.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, submitted additional papers in the contested-election case of Cox vs. Strait, of Minnesota; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RANDALL. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at half past twelve o'clock. The first business in order during the morning hour is the call of committees for reports of a public nature. The call rests with the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HURD. When the morning hour terminated under the last call of this character the Committee on the Judiciary had reported a substitute for House bill No. 363, to provide for holding terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Jackson, Tennessee. That is a bill which it is necessary shall be passed now.

Mr. KNOTT. Before that bill is taken up, I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] to yield to our colleague on the Committee on the Judiciary, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LORD,] to submit a report and have a day assigned for its consideration.

Mr. HURD. I will yield for that purpose.

DISTRIBUTION OF GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. LORD. By direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I report a substitute for House bills Nos. 211, 445, 528, and 2144, to provide for the distribution of unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award. In connection with the bill I submit also the report of the majority of the committee and also a report from the minority of the committee. The bill involves the distribution of a large sum of money, more than $10,000,000, and is of very great interest to the parties claiming a portion of the Geneva award. I move that the substitute and accompanying reports be printed.

The bill (H. R. No. 2685) was then read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed.

Mr. KNOTT. In this connection I desire to say that what is alluded to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] as the minority report of the Committee on the Judiciary is simply the views of a single member of that committee. I desire to ask for myself, the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE,] and the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ASHE,] the privilege of submitting our views in a separate paper, and that they be printed, so as to be considered with the bill now reported from the committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered. Mr. LORD. I now move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Thursday, the 30th of the present month, and that it be made the special order for that day. In the mean time the bill and the reports can be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not to interfere with reports from the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. Unless objection be made it will be so ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object to this being made the special order, unless it is understood that it shall not interfere with the reports from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LORD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. McCRARY. Is the order proposed that the bill shall be made the special order for the day named and from day to day until disposed of?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. McCRARY. Then I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] that the order be modified in that way, so that the bill may be considered from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. LORD. That is the order I intended to ask the House to make.

There was no objection, and accordingly the further consideration of the bill was postponed until Thursday, the 30th instant, and made the special order for that day and from day to day until disposed of, reports from the Committee on Appropriations excepted.

Some time subsequently,
Mr. LORD said: For considerations which have influence upon the Committee on the Judiciary, I will ask the consent of the House to change the order made in reference to the Geneva award bill, so as to fix for its consideration Wednesday, the 29th of this month, instead of Thursday, the 30th.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs leave to suggest to the gentleman from New York that where so many special orders are being made they must be considered by the House in the order in which they are set down; and there is very little gained in changing the days for their consideration from one day to another so near. If the gentleman desires it, however, the Chair will submit his request to the House.

Mr. LORD. There are certain reasons why the time fixed for the consideration of the bill should be Wednesday, the 29th, instead of Thursday, the 30th; and I desire, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, that the change be made.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN TENNESSEE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 265-6) to provide for holding terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Jackson, Tennessee.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engressed and read a

Mr. HURD. I yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Ten-

Mr. CALDWELL.]

Mr. CALDWELL.]

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the bill now before the House so much as for the purpose of making an explanation. There is an urgent necessity in the section of country which I have the honor in part to represent for the passage of some such measure as this. I had the honor of introducing into this House a bill to provide for the holding of this court at the city of Hum-House a bill to provide for the holding of this court at the city of Humboldt, regarding it, as I did and as many people in that section of the country do, as a place possessing superior accessibility for those having business in the courts. The Committee on the Judiciary have thought proper to select Jackson, Tennessee, as the place at which to hold these courts, influenced no doubt by the fact that the buildings at Jackson intended for that purpose are of a more commodious character than those at Humboldt, and by the additional fact that there are convenient larger libraries for reference, and also the still further fact that at one time the courts were held at Jackson. While I regret that the committee have seen proper to select Jackson, Tennessee, as the place for holding these courts, still, the committee having so decided, I trust the House will pass the bill without opposition.

Mr. HURD. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. ATKINS. In addition to the facts stated by my colleague [Mr. Caldwell, of Tennessee] that at Jackson there are larger libraries and more commodious buildings for court purposes, I will remark that Jackson is a very flourishing city, and is at or near the geographical center of that division of the State. I merely wish to ask one question of the gentleman who reports this substitute. I am aware that the introduction of the substitute is intended to prevent the establishment of a separate and distinct judicial division by pro-viding for two terms in that division; but I desire to ask whether it is not admissible and expected that process shall issue from this court at Jackson to the counties named in the original bill, which I introduced?

Mr. HURD. Undoubtedly it is true that the court will have power to issue process to the particular counties named in the original bill presented by the gentleman from Tennessee, and it will undoubtedly be the pleasure, as it will be the duty, of the judge of that court to so issue process as that the interests of litigants in those counties may be best promoted.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HURD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT JUDGE FOR COLORADO TERRITORY.

Mr. HUNTON, I am instructed unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back the following resolution, with a recommendation that it be adopted:

Resolved. That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to this House at an early day copies of all letters, telegrams, and papers asking for the removal of Judge Belford, a district judge for the Territory of Colorado, and copies of all letters, telegrams, and papers asking for the appointment of Judge Stone to succeed Judge Belford; also, copies of all papers, letters, and telegrams appertaining to the alleged arbitrary and corrupt rulings, orders, and decrees of Judge Stone in the interest of those who procured his appointment, which are now on file in the office of the Attorney-General; also, the names of all persons who otherwise than in writing demanded the removal of Judge Belford and the appointment of Judge Stone.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, does this resolution come from the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER. It is the unanimous report of that committee. Mr. HOAR. I am not aware of any authority for stating that it is the unanimous report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understood, it was just now so stated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON.] The Chair inquires of that gentleman whether he did not so state?

Mr. HUNTON. I stated that I was directed by the Judiciary Committee to make this report and ask the adoption of the resolution. The SPEAKER. Did not the gentleman state that he was directed by the unanimous order of the committee to make the report?

Mr. HUNTON. I probably did; and I still think so. But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] seems to have known nothing of the action of the committee upon the resolution. I think it probable he was not present at the meeting.

Mr. HOAR. I certainly do not wish to find fault; but I do not understand that as a matter of ordinary precedent there is any authority for stating that the report of a committee is unanimous, unless the have authorized that statement to be made.

Mr. HUNTON. I have no objection to modifying my statement, and saying simply that I am instructed by the committee to make

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I know nothing about the facts of this matter myself; I have never learned any of the details. But I understand that under former administrations, and administrations of different politics from the present, the Executive has refused to communicate to either House of Congress the names of persons advising or remonstrating against Executive appointments, on the ground that such advice relates to the executive duties of the President, and is not within the scope of an inquiry by either House. I know also that very early in the present Administration, in a matter which involved no suggestion of anybody's misconduct, but presented the naked question of principle, the present Executive, under the advice of his then Attorney-General, refused to make answer to a request coming from the Senate couched in similar terms to this resolution.

Mr. HUNTON. All I know about the resolution is that it was introduced into the House by a gentleman from Missouri and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. That committee thought the House had a right to the information called for, and have instructed me to report the resolution back with a recommendation that it be

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say that if the President of the United States should (as I do not think he ever will) consult me about the character of a person proposed for judge or for any other high office character of a person proposed for judge or for any other high omce in my State, and I should give him information on that subject, I would understand that such information was given to him in confidence; that as a citizen I had the right to say to the President of the United States that a certain person proposed for judge was not a good lawyer or was not of fit character for the appointment; and I should regard it as a breach of confidence if the President should disclose that advice to anybody without my consent. I hope the House will not make such a request of the Executive; but I do not care to make any point in regard to the matter.

The resolution was adopted.

UNITED STATES COURTS AT CHATTANOOGA, TENNESSEE.

Mr. HURD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 488, a bill (H. R. No. 2687) to provide for holding of terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Chattanooga, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time.

The first section provides that there shall be two terms of the United States district court for the eastern district of Tennessee, held at Chattanooga, in the county of Hamilton, in the State of Tennessee, in said district, in each year from and after the passage of this act, the time and length of said term to be fixed by the judges of the said courts respectively.

The second section provides that the clerk of the district court for the eastern district of Tennessee, the marshal, and district attorney the eastern district of Tennessee, the marshal, and district attorney for said district shall perform the duties appertaining to their offices respectively, for said courts; and the said clerk and marshal shall each appoint a deputy to reside and keep their offices at Chattanooga and who shall, in the absence of their principals, do and perform all the duties appertaining to said offices respectively. That each of said courts shall be held in a building to be provided for that purpose by the State or municipal authorities without expense to the United

Mr. HURD demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

UNITED STATES COURTS AT KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI.

Mr. HURD also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2688) to provide for holding terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States at Kansas City, Missouri; which was read a first and second time.

The first section of the bill provides that there shall be held two terms of the United States district and circuit courts for the western district of Missouri in the city of Kansas, in the State of Missouri, in each year from and after the passage of this act, the time and length of the terms to be fixed by the judges of said courts re-spectively; that the clerk of the district court for the western dis-trict of Missouri, the marshal, and district attorney for said district shall perform the duties appertaining to their offices respectively for said courts; and the said clerk and marshal shall each appoint a deputy to reside and keep his office at the said city of Kansas, and who shall, in the absence of the principal, do and perform all the duties appertaining to said office; and that each of said courts shall be held in a building to be furnished for that purpose by the State or municipal authorities without expense to the United States.

Mr. HURD. I yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Philips.]

Mr. Philips, of Missouri. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order, that as this bill in its operation and execution will necessarily involve the expenditure of public money, it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole for consideration.

Now, sir, it is true that while the bill provides that the marshal and clerk of the present district and circuit courts of that district shall furnish deputies to reside at Kansas City to perform the duties of their principals, yet there are other expenditures which are the necessary concomitants of courts which must be furnished and provided by the Gen ral Government. It is in fact a separate court, in that these deputies are to do the business of their principals, and of course are to be provided with records separate from the records kept at Jefferson City, and necessarily under this bill there will be separate grand and petit juries at each of these terms of court.

Under this bill there will be, as the law now stands, two terms of the district and two of the circuit court in each year held at Kansas City. The judiciary bill passed by this House has not yet become a law, so that the conduct of these courts will be attended with two separate grand and two separate petit juries in each year, and records will have to be furnished both for the circuit and district courts, as also for the bankrupt court. While it is true in the latter portion of the bill the duty is imposed upon the State government of Missouri or the municipal corporation of Kansas City to furnish a house in which this court is to be held, it will be optional with them whether they furnish it or not. The first portion of the bill unqualifiedly es-tablishes this court there, and if the State government and municipal corporation of Kansas City should decline or refuse to furnish this building, the next call will be upon the General Government to furnish a building, and it is impossible without the expenditure of public money to conduct the court.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. He thinks it goes beyond the limits of propriety on questions of this kind. It would be really difficult to imagine any legislation enacted by Congress that does not involve some expenditure. This may, but the expenditure is so clearly an incident that the Chair does not think it brings the bill within the rule. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. PHILIPS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I should have been much pleased to concur in the report of the Judiciary Committee, but a sense of duty to my constituents and to the people of the State of Missouri impels me not only to dissent from it, but to oppose it. For a long time there was but one Federal court in the State of Missouri, held at the city of Saint Louis. After a while a district court was organized at Jefferson City, and the State was divided into two districts, the eastern and western.

After the war, when the jurisdiction of the Federal courts had been After the war, when the jurisdiction of the Federal courts had been largely extended and their business augmented, Congress was importuned to establish also a United States circuit court for the western district of Missouri at Jefferson City, and only four years ago Congress acceded to this demand. And the circuit court is but fairly under headway when it is proposed by the bill under consideration to establish, not another court, but two additional terms of court; in effect four, two of the district and two of the circuit court, at Kansas City, on the western line of the State, only one hundred and sixty miles from Jefferson City, within the same jurisdiction now covered by the court held at the City of Jefferson.

Jefferson City, sir, is the capital of the State of Missouri. There is

Jefferson City, sir, is the capital of the State of Missouri. There is the seat of government; there sits the supreme court; there is the State library; there are all the officers and offices of the State government. The people of the State are necessarily called there to transernment. The people of the State are necessarily called there to transact all their business with the State department, and they are content and satisfied that this court should be where it is. The place is accessible to the people of the State. The greatest railroad in the State passes through it, extending from Saint Louis to Kansas City. The Missouri River, bisecting the State from east to west, sweeps by it. A railroad reaching out to the north accommodates the people of the northern part of the State. Railroads extending to the northwest and to the southwest accommodate the people of those sections. But now it is proposed to establish in effect four more terms of court two of it is proposed to establish in effect four more terms of court, two of the district and two of the circuit, at Kansas City, in the same judicial circuit; to divide the jurisdiction and the honor and patronage with the people of Jefferson City. I say, sir, it is unnecessary, it is un-

The bill in its present provisions is most onerous and unjust to the Federal officers stationed at Jefferson City. The judge, the marshal, the clerks, and all the officers about these courts have located themthe clerks, and all the officers about these courts have located them-selves at Jefferson City. They have acquired homes and established their families there. The second section of this bill requires the mar-shal and the clerks at their own expense to conduct and carry on a court at Kansas City. It requires the district judge and the United States circuit court judge to go there and hold these terms of court at their own expense. Already the salaries of these officers are moderate. Under the present appropriation bill it is proposed still further to cut them down; and now, for the accommodation of the people at Kansas City, it is proposed by this bill that this marshal and these clerks shall at their own expense furnish deputies to conduct and carry on a court at this city. It requires these deputies to conduct and carry on a court at this city. It requires these deputies to reside there. Ordinarily, a principal who is to be held responsible for the conduct of his deputies ought to be permitted the supervision and superintendence of the conduct and acts of his deputies. This privilege and this right are denied these principals under this law.

I submit this consideration: If there be any public necessity for the organization of synchronization of such as a superintend district court within this consideration.

the organization of another circuit and district court within this same jurisdiction, why not organize and constitute it in the regular way, define its jurisdiction, say over what counties this court shall exercise jurisdiction, to what counties its process shall go. As is well known by every lawyer who practices in the United States courts, four out of five of the suits that are instituted in them are by non-resident plaintiffs. The convenience of defendants and their lawyers and witnesses is not consulted in this matter.

Mr. HURD. I rise to a question of order. Have not the ten utes allowed to the gentleman from Missouri expired?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman's time is to be counted from the moment when he arose to make the point of order, it has expired. If he was to be heard ten minutes on the bill itself, it has not ex-

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. This is a matter of very considerable importance to my people. I hope I will be allowed to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] has the right to resume the floor.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I will not consume any time unnecessarily. I have not consumed much of the time of the House during this session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has but little time left at best.

He will proceed.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I trust the House will give me time to be heard on this matter. Those whom I represent and who are most directly interested in this question are not here. The Federal officials affected really have no man of their politics on this floor from Missouri to represent them, and I ask permission to be heard in their hissouri to represent them, and I ask permission to be heard in their behalf and the people of Jefferson City.

As I was proceeding to say, if the object of organizing this court at Kansas City is to accommodate the people, I submit that it does not relieve the very people who ought to be relieved by the organization of these courts. It only favors the plaintiffs and the plaintiffs' lawyers. In other words, it will favor Kansas City and the lawyers who reside there and non-resident plaintiffs; but not the people of the State of Missouri. For under this bill process may be issued from this court at Kansas City against a defendant residing in the city of Jefferson, or in the southern part of the State, or any part of the district, and the defendant with his lawyers and witnesses will be taken nolens volens to Kansas City. So the erection of this court in effect does not oblige the defendants and it does not oblige the people of the State of Missouri, but it will oblige a man living in Kansas City, or who may live over the line, to sue defendants resident anywhere Therefore as respects any benefit to the people genin the district. erally they have no more security in the proposed bill than the exist-

I repeat with emphasis, that if there be any public necessity for the constitution of a court at Kansas City, let it be done in the regular and usual way, with a defined territorial jurisdiction, with all the paraphernalia of a court; its judge and quota of ministerial officers to conduct it in decency and respectability.

Here the hammer fell.

Mr. HURD. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mis-

Mr. HURD. I now yield tell minutes to the general souri, [Mr. REA.]
Mr. REA. Idesire to state to the House that the proposition involved in this bill relates to the location at which United States district courts are to be held. Sir, I have had the honor to introduce into this House a bill to direct this court to be held in the city of Saint Joseph, in the district which I represent. I desire to state that Missouri is divided into two judicial districts, one known as the eastern judicial district with its court at Saint Louis, which includes the smaller area of Missouri, and the western district with the court held at Jefferson City. The western district is a very large district. Gentlemen all know that Missouri is a very large State. I think and believe that there ought to be a court held in the western district west of Jefferson City, (Jefferson City is in the eastern portion of the western district,) but not at Kansas City. In taking this position I do not desire to be understood as having any local opposition to Kansas City, but I believe that the court should be held at Saint Joseph, because great public interests demand that it shall be held there.

ests demand that it shall be held there.

Now what has been the action of Missouri upon this question of holding courts? I desire to say that the supreme court of the State of Missouri for a series of years has been held at three places in the State; one at Jefferson City, one at Saint Louis, where the district courts are held, and one at Saint Joseph, in the western portion of the State. The supreme court of the State was fixed at that place by the receive and that arrangement continued mutil the adortion of by the people, and that arrangement continued until the adoption of the new constitution of the State by which the court is held at the capital of the State. Again, a few years ago the lunatic asylum of the State was located near the center of the State at Fulton, but the Legislature of the State, owing to the growing population of the State, passed an act authorizing that one branch of that institution should be located in the northwestern portion of the State at Saint Joseph, thereby showing that the people of Missouri whenever they acted on this matter have shown that whenever they have sought to find a central point in the western portion of the State they have fixed on Saint Joseph as that point. The Missouri River flows through the State of Missouri near the center from northwest to southeast, dividing the State into nearly two equal portions, and the sessions of the district and circuit courts are now held either at Saint Louis or Jefferson City, both on the southern side of the river, and if you pass this bill and put this court at Kansas City you will have three courts held in that State and all of them upon the southern side

This is about all I have to say.

I think that there ought to be a court held in the western part of the western district of the State, but I believe that it ought to be held elsewhere than at Kansas City. The citizens of the State, in selecting the point at which to hold her supreme court in the western portion of the State, fixed it at Saint Joseph, and so far as court facilities are concerned, so far as railroad facilities for travel, so far as the accommodation of those who are compelled to visit the city for law purposes are concerned, Saint Joseph is unsurpassed by any city or location in the State. I hope therefore that this House will, in selecting a central point for the holding of this court, follow and be governed by the wisdom that the State Legislature of Missouri showed in fixing a point for the meeting of the supreme court of that State. I hope the bill will not pass.

Mr. HURD. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri Mr. Fixing and Mr. Fixing Mr.

Mr. FRANKLIN.]

Mr. FRANKLIN.]

Mr. FRANKLIN. I indulged the hope that the bill now pending, so meritorious in its features, would meet the fate of similar bills that have been before this House and receive its sanction without debate. And I assure you that were it not that the interests of the people of the district that I have the honor to represent, nay, were not the people of almost the entire western part of Missouri interested, and deeply interested in its passage, I should not even for the few moments I am allotted occupy the attention of the House in its discus-

It is the highest duty of Congress, the representatives of the people, to enact such legislation as will be the most beneficial and will most promote the welfare of the people. Now, I undertake to say that I can demonstrate to this House that more than a million of people will be benefited by the passage of this bill. If my colleague from Missouri is in earnest, if he is opposing this bill on principle, I pray him to tell why he sat silently in his seat this morning when a similar bill for the benefit of the people of Tennessee was brought before the House. Why did he sit silently when a bill authorizing another district in West Virginia was brought before us for action? Why did it not occur to him then that a point of order might be raised because money had to be appropriated?

Now this is the most meritorious of any bill of this character that has been before the House this session. Let me state what Congress has done in this matter of increasing judicial districts. I point to the State of Rhode Island, with only thirteen hundred and six square

State of Khode Island, with only thirteen hundred and six square miles of territory and with a population of less than a quarter of a million; they have two places for holding courts there.

There is the great State of Missouri, the fifth State in the Union, that has progressed in wealth, population, and all material interests that go to make a great people and a great State, with more rapidity in the last decade than any other State in the Union, with a population in 1870 of 1,750,000 and supposed now to be over 2,000,000, and we have only two places in which to hold the United States courts. And yet forscoth because this bill may interfere somewhat with the And yet, forsooth, because this bill may interfere somewhat with the hotel and boarding-house keepers of Jefferson City, my colleague [Mr. Philips] asks the House not to pass it, because the interests of his constituents will be affected thereby.

The State of Tennessee, with a much less area than the State of Missouri, and which is no more compact in territory, has five places in which these courts are held. The State of West Virginia, with, I believe, only 23,000 square miles of area, has four places for holding the United States district courts. The State of Indiana has four places for holding United States courts: Indianapolis, New Albany, Evansville, and, I believe, Fort Wayne.

Kansas City is situated one hundred and fifty-eight miles from Jefferson City. The western judicial district of the State of Missouri comprises all that portion of the State west of Jefferson City and extends some miles east of it: for it must be horne in mind that Jeffers tends some miles east of it; for it must be borne in mind that Jeffertends some miles east of it; for it must be borne in mind that Jefferson City is situated almost upon the eastern line of the western judicial district. Kansas City is situated one hundred and fifty-eight miles west of Jefferson City, with a population of 45,000, and is the greatest railroad center in this country; the center of one of the richest agricultural regions in the world. It is a city that, from an insignificant village of a few hundred people in 1865, surrounded by a country that was torn and rent by the red hand of war, in the last decade has grown to be the largest city between Saint Louis and San-Francisco, with its network of railroads reaching their iron hands out into all portions of the country, and with a wholesale trade extending

Francisco, with its network of railroads reaching their iron hands out into all portions of the country, and with a wholesale trade extending into all the Territories west of her and penetrating into the State of Texas. And yet the gentleman talks about the railroads and conveniences of Jefferson City, a town where the mere landing of a single steamboat produces quite a commotion. [Laughter.]

Now we only ask that this Congress will extend to the people of Western Missouri and to Kansas City just what it has granted to other States in similar bills. We have passed this morning two bills for the State of Tennessee, a State which, according to the last census, has a population of but 1,255,000, and which now has five places for holding United States courts. Yet, because this bill may take away some patronage from Jefferson City, we are told that the interests of a great part of the State of Missouri will be affected and injured by it if we pass it.

I undertake to say that there is no point in any State of the importance of Kansas City, situated as that city is situated, that is as far from the place of holding the United States court as Kansas City is. Since the western district of Missouri was organized the tide of population has swept from the eastern to the western portion of the State, until it is now the wealthiest and most populous part of the State of Missouri. When this western district was organized the great State of Kansas was but the abode of Indians; now it has more than a half a million of people within its borders, and is penetrated by several of the most important railroads of the country, from one end to the other, from the east to the west, from the north to the south, railroads that then were not thought of. The State of Missouri at that time had only one hundred and twenty-five miles of railroad.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. The circuit court has been established at Jefferson City only about four years.

Mr. FRANKLIN. Yes; but how long since the United States district the light them?

trict court was established there?

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. About twenty years.
Mr. FRANKLIN. "About twenty years." Call it twenty years, and since that time what has occurred? The tide of population has swept to the western part of Missouri.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I will state what has occurred.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I have only ten minutes, and cannot yield for interruptions

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. About ten thousand people have moved away from Kansas City within the last three years.

Mr. FRANKLIN. No, sir; the census taken since shows that Kansas City has greatly increased in population in the last three years.

Since the establishment of the western district great States have been Since the establishment of the western district great States have been established on the shores of the Pacific Ocean, great States have grown up between the Missouri River and the Rocky Mountains. And yet the gentleman who represents the Rip Van Winkle district of Missouri does not seem to appreciate it at all. He seems to think that the same order of things should go on now as thirty years ago. Had he been in Congress when the bill was before the House establishing the westcongress when the bill was before the House establishing the western judicial district of Missouri, and had he then represented the district in which Saint Louis was situated, he would have taken the position that the court ought not to go from Saint Louis; he would have told us that the interests of his constituents would be affected by the bill and that it ought not to pass; that is, the hotel and boarding-house keepers would lose some of their patronage.

Now, this bill does not compel any man to bring a suit in Kansas City. It does not say that the court there shall have exclusive jurisdiction so far as any particular county is concerned. It allows the plaintiff to elect where he will institute suit.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question

Mr. FRANKLIN. I would like to accommodate the gentleman but I have not time.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I only wish to ask the gentleman if he does not live in Kansas City?

Mr. FRANKLIN. I say that the interests of more than one million of people demand that this court shall be located at Kansas City.

[Here the hammer fell.]
The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HURD. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa,

[Mr. McCrary.]
Mr. McCrary.]
This bill presents to the House two questions: First, whether there ought to be an additional place for holding the United States court in the State of Missouri, and, secondly, whether Kansas City is the place at which it ought to be located, if such additional court is needed. As to the first question, Mr. Speaker, I think there can be no doubt that more than two places ought to be fixed by law for holding Federal courts in the great State of Missouri. In this respect that State has not facilities equal to those of other States of the Union which are similarly situated with regard to population, territory, and business to be transacted by the Federal courts. If gentlemen will refer to the statutes they will find that there is no other State at all equal to the State of Missouri in point of population, in extent of territory, in amount of business, which has not more than two places of holding Federal courts. The State of Iowa, which I have the honor in part to represent, which borders upon the State of Missouri, has four places of holding the district court, and only one place, however, of holding the circuit court. If the law were changed, as I think it should be, so that these two courts should be held at the same time and place, the State of Iowa would be provided with four places for court is needed. As to the first question, Mr. Speaker, I think there should be, so that these two courts should be held at the same time and place, the State of Iowa would be provided with four places for holding both the circuit and district courts.

I think, then, that the State of Missouri ought to have at least three places for holding these courts. This being so, the only remaining inquiry is as to whether Kansas City is the most appropriate and convenient point for locating the court. It is certainly true, as the gentleman from Missouri who has just preceded me has said, that Kansas City is one of the largest, most flourishing and prosperous cities in the whole western country. It is certainly the largest and most important place outside of the city of Saint Louis within the State of Missouri.

But, Mr. Sneaker, there are other things that a large t

But, Mr. Speaker, there are other things that should enter into the location of Federal courts. They have always been and always should be located somewhat with reference to their peculiar jurisdiction. Every gentleman knows that the jurisdiction of these courts arose out of interstate commerce and communication; and the point for locating a Federal court should be the point at which there is most of that sort of commerce, trade, and traffic which necessarily comes into the Federal courts for adjudication. Hence it is that these courts are generally located very near to the borders of our States, at points where there is a great deal of interchange between the citizens of different States. In this respect the city of Kansas is a good location for a Federal court, because it is a large commercial city, having very considerable trade with the adjoining States and Territories. Again, sir, the Federal courts, certainly the district court, should always be located with reference to the admiralty jurisdiction.

Mr. REA. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCRARY. I have but five minutes, and I prefer not to yield.

In this respect also it will be found that the city of Kansas is well located, being upon the Missouri River, one of the most important navigable streams in the country.

I think, then, sir, without detaining the House—because I want to be brief—that the State of Missouri ought to have another place for holding these courts, and that the city of Kansas, whether it be considered with reference to its population, as being a center of interstate commerce, or with regard to its location upon a great navigable river, is the most convenient and appropriate point for locating the

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. If the morning hour has expired, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is this bill, unless it is superseded by some matter of higher privilege.

Mr. HURD. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered;

and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill, Mr. BLAND said: I hope the bill will not pass in this shape. I call for a division on the question of passage.

The question being taken, there were ayes 109, noes not counted.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. FRANKLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUBSTITUTION OF SILVER COIN FOR FRACTIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to call up a privileged motion, the motion to reconsider the recommitment of the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department, and for the issue of silver coin of the United States in place of fractional currency. If the House so desires, I have no objection to the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole; and perhaps upon a point of order it must go there.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the first question is upon reconsidering the vote by which the bill was recommitted. The question being taken, the motion to reconsider was agreed to. The SPEAKER. The bill is now before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill; but I would like, in the first place, to have the House agree to limit the debate in Committee of the Whole to two hours, allowing fifteen minutes to each speaker.

SALE OF LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. GOODIN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 1984) to provide for the sale of certain lands in Kansas, and the same be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which motion was agreed to.

SUBSTITUTION OF SILVER COIN FOR FRACTIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department, and for the issue of silver coin of the United States in place of fractional currency. Pending that motion, I move that general debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on that bill be limited

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I suggest ten-minute speeches.
Mr. RANDALL. I accept that as a modification of my motion.
There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.
The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SAYLER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question under consideration is the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department, and for the issue of silver coin of the United States in place of fractional currency. The House has ordered that general debate be limited to two hours, to be divided into ten-minute speeches. The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Beit enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled: That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $163,000, to provide for engraving, printing, and other expenses of making and issuing United States notes.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to issue silver coins of the United States of the denomination of ten, twenty, twenty-five, and fifty cents, of standard value, in redemption of an equal amount of fractional currency, whether the same be now in the Treasury awaiting redemption or wherever it may be presented for redemption; and the Secretary of the Treasury may, under regulations of the Treasury Department, provide for such redemption and issue by substitution at the regular subtreasuries and public depositories of the United States until the whole amount of fractional currency outstanding shall be redeemed.

Mr. RANDALL. The first section of this bill provides for the appropriation of $163,000 for the reprinting of worn and mutilated United States notes commonly known as "greenbacks." The second section provides for what I may term the substitution of silver coin section provides for what I may term the substitution of silver coin of the denominations therein stated for fractional currency now out. There can be but little discussion as to the first section, because all agree to the absolute necessity of that appropriation. The amount asked for reprinting the mutilated and worn fractional currency by the Treasury Department was $255,450.25. This brought the committee directly to consider the propriety and feasibility of the substitution of silver coin for fractional currency now out, and it reached the conclusion that now is the time when that substitution for fractional currency by the issuance of silver coin, one of the constitutional tional currency by the issuance of silver coin, one of the constitutional legal-tenders, could be successfully accomplished.

They further reached the conclusion that as a question of economy in the annual cost to the Government it was possible to make this in the annual cost to the Government it was possible to make this change now. And when I shall have heard the objections to this bill, if there are any, I shall be able to meet them, and explain more at length at the close of this debate, and give the figures and reasons which brought the Committee on Appropriations to that conclusion. On this branch, as to the economy of the substitution, I desire to have read certain remarks prepared by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Wells,] a member of the Committee on Appropriations, who has been necessarily called away, as an intelligent exposition of the attitude of the committee. If Mr. Wells were present he would perhaps be able to explain in detail, if questioned, the assertions he makes, and as far as able in his absence I will do it.

The remarks of Mr. Wells were read by the Clerk, as follows:

Mr. Wells, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few facts relative to the fractional currency of the country, and endeavor facts relative to the fractional currency of the country, and endeavor to show that the actual amount now in circulation does not exceed $30,000,000. In order to do so it will be necessary to refer to the monthly statements made by the Secretary of the Treasury and to such other data as I have been able to procure.

It will be seen by the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury dated March 1, 1876, that the volume of fractional currency amounted to $45,120,132.47. I am informed that of this amount there was in the vault of the Treasury $5,000,000, leaving in circulation that day

On examination, I find that of the series of 1862 there was outstanding July 1, 1875, $4,328,336. Of this issue there was outstanding March 1, 1876, $4,297,613; destroyed during eight months, $30,775. Of this amount there was in the Treasury as specimens, which was never put in circulation, the sum of $28,620, leaving, as actually redeemed of said issue, but $2,105.
Of the second series issued in 1864 there was outstanding July 1, 1875, $3,139,847. Of this series outstanding March 1, 1876, $3,119,204. Actually destroyed during the eight months, $20,643. Of this amount there was in the Treasury as specimens, which were never in circula-there was in the Treasury as specimens, which were never in circulation, $14,800, making of said issue that had actually been in circulation and redeemed in eight months but $5,843.

Of the third series issued, of 1866, there was outstanding July 1, 1875, $31,646.43. Outstanding March 1, 1876, $30,865.25. Actually destroyed during eight months $78,118. Of said amount there was in the Treasury as specimens, which were never in circulation, $56,300, leaving the actual amount that was redeemed of the outstanding cur-

It will be seen that the amount now outstanding of the three series March 1, 1876, is $10,503,342.

Taking this as a basis of the redemption of this class of currency redeemed during the past eight months, and after deducting the amount that was destroyed during said period, fractional currency that had never been put in circulation, it will be found to be the sum of only $28,966.

Of the fourth series issued, of 1868, there was outstanding July 1, 1875, $15,165,237. Outstanding March 1, 1876, $9,290,085. Redeemed in eight months, $5,875,152.
The amount of fractional currency of the respective series outstand-

The amount of fractional currency of the respective series outstanding amounts to $16,378,494, and it may be proper to state that the chief clerk of the United States Treasury Bureau, who has for years handled the books, recording the daily, monthly, and yearly receipts of fractional currency of the series called in, has after a careful estimate placed the loss of this currency at twelve millions. Again, it is estimated that twenty-three millions of fractional currency is abundantly sufficient to supply the country with small change, exclusive of nickels and promise. by the country with small change, exclusive of nickels and pennies, which amount to upward of $2,000,000, so that thirty millions of silbut allow nearly one-third to be hoarded without causing a scarcity in any part of the country. Assuming such to be the case, the amount now in the Treasury, say five millions, believed to be a fair estimate of the average of this class of currency retained in the Treasury, toof the average of this class of currency retained in the freasury, to-gether with the amount that is estimated by the chief clerk of the United States Treasury Redemption Bureau, which is not less than $12,000,000, making a total of $17,000,000 to be deducted from the whole amount reported by the Treasurer as outstanding, namely, $45,120,132.40, will leave of this class of currency only $28,120,132.40, which I believe to be a fair calculation and estimate, especially so when we take into consideration the fact that, from the statement prepared by the Treasury Department for the fiscal year 1875, the average amount in course of transit to the Treasurer's Office daily is $110,589 and the average amount from the Treasurer's Office $110,246. The same year there was printed and issued from the Treasurer's Office upward of $40,000,000 of fractional currency, showing plainly that a large amount did not remain out but a short time. An examination of the currency when returned still further corroborates this statement, as it is quite new and but little worn.

Taking the fractional currency actually outstanding, as I have estimated it to be, at $28,000,000, as a basis, which would seem to be a fair estimate, it costs the Government over 5 per cent. per annum to print and recirculate this currency. I believe that no person, after giving this question a fair and impartial, investigation, can come to any conclusion other than the one the committee of which I have the honor to be a member has arrived at, which is to substitute silver in its place.

In support of this conclusion it is only necessary to refer to the statement prepared at the Treasury Department, which I hold in exhand, showing that it cost the people for the printing and other expenses of the fractional currency $1,410,746.95 for the year ending June 30, 1875.

It is my purpose to show the House that it will be a saving to the Government to issue silver coin in lieu of said currency for the following reasons: Standard silver bullion can now be purchased at the rate or price of from 103½ cents to 105½ cents per ounce. The coining rate of this silver is 124.4 cents per ounce, which makes the stamped or nominal value from 18.6 to 21 cents per ounce greater than the bullion or export value. The gold premium must rise above these rates before the coin can be disturbed for melt or export.

To secure silver for the manufacture of $30,000,000 in coin it will be necessary to issue $25,200,000 of gold bonds drawing 5 per cent. They can be placed at or above par, or exchanged for the silver at the figures stated. The annual interest on that amount of bonds will be

I have no doubt that a 4½ per cent. bond could be placed at par or exchanged for silver, which would make the interest $1,134,000.

There being already coined and ready for circulation $12,000,000, which is now a dead letter and an expense, and there being sufficient silver at the different mints to coin $4,000,000 more, would make a total of $16,000,000.

To enable the Government to purchase $14,000,000 additional silver, it would take $11,760,000 of gold bonds say, at 5 per cent. interest, would amount to $588,000; at 4½ per cent. interest, would amount to $529,000.

Taking the estimated expense of the fractional currency per annum to be $1,410,746.95 and the interest on $25,200,000 at 5 per cent. per annum—which would be necessary to secure $30,000,000 of silver bullion—which would amount to $1,260,000, would make a saving of $150,746.95; at 4½ per cent. would be a saving of the currency of $276,746.95. The interest on $11,760,000 of 5 per cent. bonds to purchase $14,000,000 of silver bullion would be a saving of $822,746.95; at 4½ per cent. it would be a saving of $881,746.95.

It will be borne in mind that in this estimate I have not taken into consideration the rents paid by the Government in connection with the preparation of fractional currency, which amounts to several thousand dollars annually.

In calculating the cost of coining the silver it is estimated by the Director of the Mint that it will not be necessary to recoin oftener than once in fifty years, making the expense about $9,000 per annum, the first cost being 1½ per cent. In the event of gold being coined at the same time in the mints, its cost will be much less.

at the same time in the mints, its cost will be much less.

From the facts before us I trust there can be but one conclusion, and that will be that the sooner this perishable and expensive currency is superseded by the issuing of silver coin in its place the greater satisfaction it will be to the people of this country.

Before the Clerk had concluded the reading, the time had expired. Mr. BLOUNT took the floor and yielded his time, when the reading of the speech was concluded.

Mr. RANDALL. My time has expired under the limitation of debate to ten minutes.

Mr. WARD. I do not think there will be any objection to the gentleman answering the question which I will propound to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has three or four minutes of his time left.

Mr. BLOUNT. Very well; I will yield to the gentleman from New

Mr. WARD. The question I desire to put is this: Whether this bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion may issue this silver coin?

Mr. RANDALL. It does not, as the Secretary of the Treasury has that discretion now, but fails to execute the law. This question was presented to us as an economical one; and further on in its considera-tion as one of public policy. If the gentleman from New York will read the second section, he will there find the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to issue silver coin in substitution of fractional curissue of silver as premature. The House to-day, in my judgment, is not fully advised whether silver is at par, or above or below par. will readily occur to gentlemen that, if silver is above par even per cent., the moment this coin is issued it will be hoarded, and then we will be left without either silver, coin, or fractional currency for small change, to the extent of the silver coin thus issued. I believe, Mr. Chairman, this is a partial attempt to resume in advance of the proper time. If we are to issue this currency I think it should be left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to do it at a time when silver is at or below par. I know of no measure more advisable than the issue of currency of this kind for the people; but if you issue it prematurely and failure results, we will be subject to the ridicule of the country.

I want to say that, from my observation while in France during the suspension of specie payment, I incline favorably to the issue of small silver currency at as early a period as it can prudently be done. I found an abundance of silver coin in circulation among the people of that country to such an extent that the people really did not miss the absence of gold and considered paper preferable for ordinary use: and the consequence was that at that time gold was at a premium of only ½ per cent.; and, in fact, since the suspension of specie payments by the Bank of France their paper has never depreciated below 2½ per cent. discount, and it is now to-day at par. Therefore I know of no measure that I would more earnestly desire to see carried out than this, if the time had arrived. But I feel that the time has not arrived. Silver is not yet at par or below nor see at overrout this measure. Silver is not yet at par or below par, so as to warrant this measure.

Mr. RANDALL. Silver is below greenbacks.

Mr. WARD. I am not aware of that.
Mr. RANDALL. Yes; its market value shows it.
Mr. WARD. But the moment this bill passes it will go above par and it will be withdrawn from circulation as currency.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARD. I desire to say but a very few words more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. WARD. I do not propose to make any extended remarks. I only want two or three minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. There are two hours allowed for debate, and if necessary that time can be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the committee, by unanimous consent, extend the time of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARD?]

Mr. RANDALL. Let the gentleman take his ten minutes in his own right.

Mr. KELLEY. Whose ten minutes would the committee give him?

Mr. RANDALL. His own.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from New York proceeding for ten minutes?
Mr. KELLEY. If that would exclude any other gentleman who is now entitled to the floor, I object.

now entitled to the floor, I object.

Mr. RANDALL. It does not.
Mr. KELLEY. Do you propose to extend the time allowed for debate by these ten minutes?
Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will proceed.
Mr. WARD. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to occupy the time so kindly allotted to me; not being aware that a question so important would be brought forward to-day, I shall therefore not detain the committee but a very few moments. My object in rising was to make a few suggestions which I have already offered.

There is no member of this House more anxious for the resumption of specie payments than I am; but I desire to say, and I think that is the impression of the country generally, that resumption cannot be attained until some very distant period. And it should be our object in the first place before we issue this silver currency to put ourselves in the direction of a return to a sound and convertible currency; but in my judgment until legislation tends in that direction, and until in my judgment until legislation tends in that direction, and until paper approximates more nearly in value to gold than it does now, it would be injudicious and impolitic for us to undertake this partial resumption.

It will be recollected that under a late Secretary of the Treasury there was an attempt made to issue a portion of the currency in silver. I remember going myself into a bank on one occasion and being handed in silver part of the amount I was drawing. But all the silver issued at that time was immediately hoarded. Not a dollar of it went into circulation.

If this House desires to go in the direction of resumption, it must direct its attention toward the convertibility of the paper currency of the country. It is not essential in order to attain that result that there should be any very rapid contraction of the currency. I am satisfied that if Congress would adopt a plan of very moderate contraction of the legal-tenders it would be a step in the right direction, and would not at all interfere with the business interests of the country, as the country would rapidly adapt itself to the new condition. After a few years we might be enabled to determine the time when we should resume, and such moderate contraction would soon lead to confidence and gradual prosperity. No one expects immediate re-sumption, but what the country does expect and our financial and commercial interests demand is that we should put ourselves in the direction of specie payment, and no let-alone policy, no policy that involves anything but the contraction of the legal-tender circulation You may contract it only a million a month, or half a million a month; but the very moment you do that, you will find that confidence will return, capital will be invested, and there will be a general feeling of returning prosperity. And there is no other method by which you can attain it except that of funding your legal-tender and having it ultimately all withdrawn, relying on the banking currency of the country for necessary uses and to supply any deficiency of the legal-

Now, until we approach or put ourselves in the direction of a return to a sound convertible currency, I regard it as impracticable or at least unadvisable to use this silver currency. I should be very sorry as a member of this House to vote for this measure, for I believe that within a brief time after the issue of this coin the silver would be withdrawn from circulation. By this measure I feel we would place ourselves in a false position before the country and the world. Therefore, in my oninion, the time has not arrived when this world. Therefore, in my opinion, the time has not arrived when this change can safely be made. And I hope this bill may be amended; if it is desirable to pass it, leave the power where it now is, so that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the discretion to issue the silver whenever in his judgment silver is sufficiently low in the market to warrant its being done.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Before commencing my remarks, I ask the clerk to read an amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the words "section 2" and insert the following:
That sections 1 and 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, are hereby repealed, and that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sell and dispose of so much of the silver bullion and coin now accumulated in the Treasury as may not be required for the current operations of the Mint.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Chairman, lest the remarks which I am about to make may be misunderstood, let me say at the outset that, in view of the gravity of the financial condition of this country at the present time, all questions of party should be sunk in an earnest and determined effort of patriotic men to unite, without regard to party, to secure such legislation as will tend to relieve our finance from embarrasement, to place our money system upon a sound basis from embarrassment, to place our money system upon a sound basis, in harmony with the currency of the rest of the world, to restore to activity the depressed industries of the country, and to give speedy employment to the idle army of laborers who now occupy the land. For one, I here declare my readiness and my intention not to permit any party trammels or any fear of the political consequences to interfere with my duty in this respect, and I here state that I am quite ready to advocate any policy, wherever it may originate, which will bring us back to the only sure ground of a specie basis.

THE RESUMPTION ACT OF 1875.

But the existing laws regulating the finances of the country are essentially in execution of the policy of the republicans, and will be discussed as such. The act of January 14, 1875, "to provide for the resumption of specie payments" on the 1st of January, 1879, was agreed upon by a cancus of republican Senators and made a party measure, both in the Senate and the House of Representatives, the democrats both in the Senate and the House of Representatives, the democrats generally voting and many of the leaders of the democratic party speaking against it. It was, therefore, a republican, and not a democratic, measure; and, unless the majority in this House see fit to assume the responsibility by indorsing it in whole or in part, the failure of this act to produce any beneficial results to the suffering business of the country, its tendency to aggravate the evils under which the people are groaning, and the want of statesmanship apparent in the framing of legislation confessedly powerless for good unless supplemented by further legislation are chargeable to the republican party, and the republican party alone.

That the act cannot be carried into effect without further legislation is practically admitted by the present able Secretary of the

tion is practically admitted by the present able Secretary of the Treasury in his last annual report to Congress, in which he uses the following cautious but unmistakable language:

The act in question not only makes express provision for resumption at a fixed date, but commits the Government to the use of all such means as may be needful to that end. If experience shall show that the means provided by Congress need to be supplemented by further legislation for the easier and more certain accomplishment of the end, it must be assumed that Congress will not suffer the great purpose to be impeded for want of such additional legislation. The act confers large powers upon the Secretary of the Treasury touching the issue of United States bonds for the purpose of procuring the supply of gold necessary to execute such of its drovisions as go into immediate operation and to provide for the redemption in gold of United States notes outstanding on and after January 1, 1879. In this respect the power conferred upon the Secretary is ample, but if for any cause it should be found impracticable to accumulate in the Treasury a sufficient amount of gold to carry out the provisions of the act, the Secretary is left without the choice of other means to accomplish the end. It may perhaps be doubted whether the process of accumulating a large amount of gold by a given time could go on without meeting opposition from the financial powers of the world. It is safe to say that so large an amount of gold as would be required to carry out the purpose and direction of the act cannot be suddenly acquired. It can only be done by gradual processes and by taking advantage of favorable conditions of the money market from time to time.

This is the cautious official language, which, when translated into plain English, means that it is not possible to resume specie payments in 1879 by the mere accumulation of gold without contraction; that the resumption act therefore was a hasty piece of crude partisan legislation, meant to gain a temporary political object, and without any just ground for expectation on the part of its framers that it could produce any permanent beneficial results. But it has been productive of very great evils, and has operated as a most serious check to any revival in the business and the industries of the country. No prudent man will engage in any new enterprise or lock up any capital in the face of a law on the statute-book, the execution of which, as the Secretary plainly warns the country, will derange the money markets of the world, and, as a consequence, bring ruin and disaster upon those who may happen to have large obligations to meet, based though they may be upon enterprises which would be abundantly remunerative when once completed and properly established in the general system of trade. The resumption act therefore produces a paralysis of enterprise, energy, and capital, and labor stands idle and suffering throughout the land.

To amend this act so as if possible to remove this paralysis is undoubtedly the part of statesmanship and the duty of Congress; but until to-day no effort has been made in this direction either by the minority or the majority of this House. It is natural that the country should regard with intense interest the slightest movement of Congress toward remedying the evils under which it is suffering, and it is the duty of every member of this House to study with the utmost care any proposition, however limited in its scope, which bears upon the resumption act and the carrying of any of its provisions into

SILVER-COIN CLAUSE.

One of these provisions is contained in the first section of the act, and directs that the Secretary of the Treasury shall, "as rapidly as possible," provide silver coins to take the place of the fractional currency, and no doubt the framers of the act regarded the substitution of silver for the fractional currency as the first effective step in the direction of specie payments. But those who have made finance a subject of study did not so regard the measure at the time of its passage, and subsequent experience and examination have fully confirmed this view. The law, however, was mandatory, and the Secretary proceeded to purchase the bullion and coin it into money, and no doubt would long since have begun the exchange of silver for paper if he had not come to the conclusion that it was doubtful whether the silver would remain in circulation. At the date of the passage of the law and for some months previous the price of gold had ranged between 110 and 1138, at which rate it would not pay to melt up or export the coin, and there were plenty of patriotic republicans who asserted that the best money in the world would never again go to a discount of 15 per cent. But in the very next month after the passage of the act gold went to 15\frac{a}{5}, in March to 17 per cent. and during the rest of the year ranged between 17\frac{a}{5} and 15 per cent. premium. Of course no silver was paid out, not even on "the five-dollar-resumption plan."

Now let us see what the Secretary says about it in his annual re-

The Secretary has been urged to begin the work of resumption by issuing silver coin in redemption of outstanding currency, and it has been insisted that under the first section of the act he has no discretion, but must issue the silver coin as fast as it can be turned out from the mints. While the act requires the coinage to proceed as rapidly as practicable, it does not in terms require the Secretary to issue it at once, nor does it fix the time when the issue must begin. For obvious reasons it has been, and yet is, impracticable to put or keep silver coin in circulation. The present depreciation of currency below gold precludes the possibility that silver would remain in circulation; and therefore it has been deemed impracticable to issue it for the present, or until, by the nearer approach of, or greater preparation for, general resumption, there shall be such an appreciation of the circulating currency of the country as would give assurance that the silver coin to be issued would not be hoarded for shipment abroad or converted into plate and jewelry or reduced to bullion.

Here, then, is the official confession that the republican silver reof keeping silver coin in circulation depends upon the premium on gold, which, during the past year, has fluctuated 9½ per cent; and thus far there is nothing on the statute-book or in the laws of nature which will warrant any man in asserting that this range of fluctua-tion will not be maintained and may not be even greatly exceeded. To legislate silver into circulation under such circumstances is pure guess-work, without the first element of statesmanship or any proper regard for the laws of finance. The attempt to do this has simply made the financial magnates of the republican party ridiculous throughout the country and a laughing-stock to the financiers of the world. If it had its origin, which I do not believe, in the fertile brain of the distinguished Senator who regulates the republican financial legislation, it will justly entitle him to a high place among the many "cheap Johns" who have figured in the history of finance.

FALL IN THE PRICE OF SILVER.

But there is such a thing as luck, even in legislation, and the re-But there is such a thing as luck, even in legislation, and the republican party have always had their share of it, and it was never more manifest than in this silver business, as I shall endeavor to show. At the date of the passage of the resumption act, and for some months thereafter, the price of fine silver in London averaged 56.99 pence, practically 57 pence per ounce. But meanwhile the Big Bonanza began to pour into the markets of the world its marvelous product of silver. I have no doubt that the promoters of the resumption act knew perfectly well what was going to happen, and thought it would not be a bad thing if they could get a cash market for $40,000,000 of their product, and especially for a goodly pile of it before the general market was affected by the enormous yield of silver. Mark how careful the act is to instruct the Secretary to proceed to coin the silver as rapidly as possible, and yet how indifferent it is as to the paying out of the coins. In fact it would suit the bonanza party better that they should not be paid out at all. The very best thing that could happen to them would be to transfer the bullion from their mines to the United States mints and let it lie there. This would be a sale of the mine, better than the Emma operation, without any "curses coming home to roost." Well, it appears by the report of the Director of the Mint that these bonanza gentlemen were pretty successful in getting rid of their silver before it fell in value. He purchased $12,658,054.68 up to the 1st of October last at an average of 111.4 cents per ounce, which is the equivalent, as near as may be, of 56½ pence per ounce in London. The price last week in London is 52½ pence per ounce, a fall of nearly 4 pence per ounce, which, on the quantity purchased to October 1, makes a difference of nearly $1,000,000, and including that since purchased, of over $1,000,000 out of the Treasury into the pockets of the "big bonanza" party. No wonder that the Secretary was directed to hurry up with the coinage, while no one was found to hurry up the issue of the coins. from their mines to the United States mints and let it lie there. This

FREE COINAGE OF GOLD.

But this was not all that the bonanza party secured by the act of January, 1875. The product of their mines is only 60 per cent. in silver; the remaining 40 per cent., luckily for them and the country, is in gold. To get this gold put into double eagles used to cost something. In fact, it always costs something, but formerly they had to pay the cost or seignorage, which was $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent. By the second section of the resumption act, which might with more propriety be termed the "big bonanza act," this seignorage is remitted, and now the people of the United States pay for coining the gold of the big bonanza party into double eagles, which are promptly exported and sold at an advance of $\frac{1}{5}$ of 1 per cent. over bullion. No doubt the financial wiseacres of the republican party believed that the stamp of the United States Mint would keep these double eagles at home, and were willing to pay $\frac{1}{5}$ of 1 per cent. for this benefit, which no one will deny would have been cheap at the price; but, as the Secretary was not prepared to hoard gold as well as silver and there was no use for gold in this country, it went abroad under laws more powerful than the clauses of the bonanza act, and will continue to go until a practical scheme of legislation is devised looking to the certain resumption of specie payments. of January, 1875. The product of their mines is only 60 per cent. in resumption of specie payments.

I have said that there is such a thing as luck even in legislation, and that the republican party or "big bonanza" party has its share of it. The fall in the price of silver within four months has made it possible to put subsidiary silver coins into circulation, without their leaving the country or going into the melting-pot, unless gold should advance to 120 per cent. or the price of silver should again advance in the London market. That this fall in the price is a piece of unexpected good fortune to the Treasury officials is apparent from the report of the Director of the Mint, transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury in December last. He says, on page 306:

During the last two months, September and October, the price in London has recovered from fifty-five pence to about fifty-seven pence.

And then adds at the close of the section, on page 307:

We may reasonably expect an increased demand for silver, but not sufficient to cause for some time a material alteration in the present relative valuation of gold and silver, which is about one to seventeen.

This report was dated November 20, 1875, not four months ago, and in the interval the ratio between gold and silver has fallen to as one

DEMOCRATIC APPROVAL WANTED.

Who will say that this is not unexpected good luck? So much so, that the Secretary has taken heart, and sees his way clear to putting out the silver, provided he can get the approval of a democratic House. Why does he want this approval? He has the power without it. He is a republican official, and the law under which the action is proposed to be taken was passed by a republican Congress and approved by a republican President. But gold may go to 120 per cent. one of these fine days, and then where will go his silver coinage? It will disappear in a night, and next morning the people will find themselves without small change to do business. Whose fault will that be? As the law now stands, the republican party will have to bear the odium. Or the price of silver may suddenly go up to fiftyto bear the odium. Or the price of silver may suddenly go up to fifty-five or fifty-seven pence per ounce, as it would do if the big bonanza were to "peter out," and then the silver would go "where the wood-were to "peter out," and then the silver would go "where the woodbine twineth," and the people would be looking out for change; which might result in a change of Administration.

Of course it will be a very convenient answer to say that the Secretary did not, and in fact declined to, substitute silver for currency until he was directed to do so by a democratic House, and that the democrats and not the republicans are responsible for the consequences. If, however, gold or the price of silver should not advance, and the silver coinage should stay out, it will be a republican measure, the success of which will inure to their credit and be claimed as the first practical step in the direction of specia resumption. It is "beads

I win and tails you lose" every time.

O, most judicious Secretary, to come thus to a House new to business, and composed largely of members never before in public life, and persuade them to assume the responsibility of a measure which thus far has only resulted in the loss of a million dollars in the purchase of silver, and in the coinage "free gratis for nothing" of the bonanza gold!

Will you walk into my parlor, Says the spider to the fly, &c.

But, still more astute, in going to the Committee on Appropriations on the plea of economy getting the committee to recommend to this House the passage of a mandatory act relieving the Secretary and the republican party from the responsibility of a great financial blunder!

PLEA OF ECONOMY FALSE.

And now for the plea of economy with which the astute Secretary

And now for the plea of economy with which the astute Secretary baited the silver hook which secured a favorable report from the Committee on Appropriations for the bill now under discussion.

In the report of the Director of the Mint, page 301, it is asserted that the annual renewal of fractional currency amounts to $36,000,000, the cost of which, during the last fiscal year, is estimated by the Treasury officers to have been $1,410,746. I have searched in vain through the reports of the Treasury officials for the data upon which this estimate is made, and except in the report of the Director of the Mint for the estimate itself. I find, however, in the report of the Register, page 511 that the number of fractional notes canceled and destroyed during the second of the control 511, that the number of fractional notes canceled and destroyed during the year was 191,360,000, which would make the cost of renewing each note fourteen-nineteenths, equal to about three-quarters of a cent. In order to ascertain whether this is a fair cost or not, I have applied to the American Bank-Note Company and the National Bank-Note Company for information as to the fair cost of renewing $36,000,000 of currency annually, and I now submit their responses, each made without the knowledge of the other:

NEW YORK, March 6, 1876.

Dear Sir: In reply to your note of the 4th instant as to how much, in our judgment, is a fair cost of producing $36,000,000 in fractional currency on the best quality bank-note paper, with the best safeguards in engraving, we have to say that $36,000,000 in fractional currency, divided as to denomination, ten cents, twenty-five cents, and fifty cents, and proportion of each the same as the fractional currency produced by the Government during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1875, can be furnished, entirely new, at, in round figures, $1,000,000, and kept in condition for circulation by such re-issues as might be found necessary, at an expense not to exceed $700,000 per year, and this figure could probably be reduced to half a million if we could be unrestricted in our judgment as to the best methods of preparing the work.

The estimate of 4 per cent. cost upon its round value is entirely too high.

We base our estimate upon a contemplated issue requiring the production of about 13,000,000 impressions, all denominations combined.

Very sincerely, yours,

A. D. SHEPARD, President National Bank-Note Company.

Hon. A. S. HEWITT, Washington, D. C.

AMERICAN BANK-NOTE COMPANY, New York, March 6, 1876.

New York, March 6, 1876.

Dear Sir: I have your favor of 4th instant. The expense of renewing annually $36,000,000 of fractional currency would of course depend upon the relative proportions of the different denominations issued. Assuming, however, that Dr. Linderman's statement of cost. $1,400,000 is based on the issue of the last fiscal year, I find that the proportions in round figures were, $2,000,000 in ten-cent notes, $20,000,000 in twenty-five-cent notes, and $8,000,000 in fifty-cent notes. If asked to estimate on the part of this company for this amount of work, executed in the very best style, with all the printings necessary for proper security, and on good, substantial paper, I would name $950,000 as about a fair price. You will readily understand, sir, that my estimate of cost is based on the assumption that the work would be done by a corporation organized to transact its business in the most efficient manner, and at the least possible expense, and not at a Government establishment, where the operations are conducted without a due regard to economy.

If I can be of any further service to you in this connection, do not hesitate to call upon me at any time.

Yours, very truly,

C. L. VAN ZANDT,

C. L. VAN ZANDT, Vice-President.

Hon. Abram S. Hewitt, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Whether these estimates are correct or not, it is stated by the Secretary that owing to some error in the appropriation bill of last year the sum of $250,000 was needlessly expended in stamping by hand instead of plate-printing. This would reduce the cost estimated by the Treasury to $1,160,746. Again, it is alleged that the renewals are in excess of the actual necessities of the case. I think that the experience of every one will confirm the statement that the currency now in circulation is in remarkably clean and excellent condition. To me it is inconceivable that more than $1,000,000 per condition. To me it is inconceivable that more than $1,000,000 per annum can be properly expended in renewals of the fractional currency, including all expenses; and I am satisfied that contracts can be made with perfectly responsible firms to do the work for less money. Taking, then, the fair cost at a million of dollars annually, let us compare it with the cost of substituting silver for the paper currency. The total amount in circulation is $42,000,000. This sum must be purchased by the issue of either $4\frac{1}{2}$ or 5 per cent. bonds, the higher rate having already been paid to the extent of $15,000,000 of bullion already purchased. The annual interest charge alone is therefore $1.800.000.

The Director of the Mint states, on page 302, that the cost of coining $43,854,708 last year was $889,370, which is the expense to which the country will be put at once for the substitution. The cost of maintenance afterward would be a merely nominal amount, unless by the rise of gold as compared with paper or by the rise in silver the coin should go abroad or be melted up, in which case this outlay would be utterly lost, and would have to be incurred again whenever we might return to specie payments. It is just this contingency which the Secretary (and with good reason) so fears that he wants the command of retary (and with good reason) so fears that he wants the command of Congress to make the issue.

To save, therefore, what I estimate too largely at $1,000,000 to maintain the currency, and which the Treasury estimates at $1,160,746, we must annually pay out at least $1,800,000 in interest, besides the expense of coinage. I cannot see the economy, and I shall be glad to see it pointed out before this additional load is added to our burdens of taxation, already too heavy to be borne.

NOT A STEP TOWARD SPECIE PAYMENTS.

But they tell us that this is the first step in the resumption of specie payments, and for that reason the hard-money men of the House should support it. If it were in reality a step toward specie payments, I would support it with all my heart even at the unnecessary cost of the operation. I acknowledge myself to be for hard money, for resumption, and for quick resumption, as the shortest and best, and in my judgment the only road out of the distress and stagnation of business which prevail throughout the land.

But I deny that the substitution of subsidiary silver coin for the fractional currency has anything to do with the resumption of specie fractional currency has anything to do with the resumption of specie payments. It is the substitution of metallic tokens for paper ones. The only specie resumption known to the law or to the great commercial nations is resumption in gold. For minor coins, copper, nickel, silver, or paper may be used; and their purchasing power, whenever they may be in excess of the demand, will be measured by what they will produce in gold. The fractional currency now in use derives its value from the fact that it is redeemable in sums of $5 or upward in legal-tender notes, and the legal-tender dollar will purchase—with gold at 15 per cent. premium—87 cents in gold. The subsidiary silver dollar—with silver at 52\frac{3}{2} pence per ounce—will only purchase 83.4 cents in gold. cents in gold.

To substitute the silver for the paper is therefore to substitute a coin of less purchasing power for the fractional currency. The resumption of specie payments means that one dollar in currency shall sumption of specie payments means that one dollar in currency shall purchase one dollar in gold. The existing paper is therefore nearer to specie payments than the proposed silver coin. The substitution is therefore a step backward from and not a step forward to specie payments, and is therefore in direct violation of that clause of the New York democratic platform on which every democratic member from that State holds his seat on this floor, to wit: "Steady steps toward specie payments, no step backward."

But the silver will not only possess less purchasing power than paper, but it is more fluctuating in value. During the last four years legal-tender notes have fluctuated in value 10.38 per cent., while during the same time silver has fluctuated 12.44 per cent.

But in other particulars the investment of $40,000,000 in silver not available for specie payments is an enormous step backward, inasmuch available for specie payments is an enormous step backward, inasmuch available for specie payments is an enormous such backward, masmuch as it deprives us of the use of $40,000,000 which might be invested in gold and thus put us well on the way toward the accumulation of that sum which is necessary to be in hand before we can retire or make our legal-tender notes equal in value to gold. This error is so serious that I am amazed at the hardihood of the promoters of the resumption act in ever supposing that the people of this country would permit such a diversion of their resources to the creation of a currency more depreciated than the paper money now in use; and I can only account for it on the theory that the managers of the republican party themselves stand aghast at the humiliating position in which they are placed in reference to the resumption act, upon which they staked their whole financial reputation and which was proclaimed to the world as the panacea for all our wees, surely bringing us to specie payments by the 1st of January, 1879.

After one year's trial, the specie in the Treasury available for resumption instead of being increased has run down to $13,341,423.76, and the Secretary of the Treasury confesses that he is powerless to increase the reserves; the purchases of silver for coinage have resulted in a loss of $1,000,000, besides the cost of coinage, and it is certain to depreciate still more; the Mint has been kept at work at the public expense coining gold for private parties to export for their own profit; the premium on gold is advancing from day to day, indicatively. own profit; the premium on gold is advancing from day to day, indicating a steady recession from specie payments; and this is the whole practical fruit of the resumption act. As to the silver business they fear to go on, lest the loss be aggravated by a further fall in value, and they fear to stop and sell the silver because the loss already incurred and the sham preteness of the resumption act will then become apparent to the whole country. They have therefore resorted to the shrewd device of committing the majority of this House to the substitution of silver coin for fractional paper currency, thus seeking to avoid the just responsibility for their blunders of legislation and improvidence of expenditure. improvidence of expenditure.

MAKING SILVER A LEGAL TENDER.

There is still one other explanation of this bold attempt to secure There is still one other explanation or this bold attempt to secure the approval of a democratic House to this sham resumption in depreciated silver coins. It is perhaps intended to follow up this movement with an effort to secure legislation making silver a legal tender for the payment of debts larger than $5, possibly of all debts. It may well be argued that if it be resumption to pay debts under $5 in silver, it is equally specie resumption to pay larger debts in the debts, for they are only aggregates of five-dollar debts. The argument is so sound that it shows the hollow nature of the whole pretense that there is any specie resumption in the substitution for paper of silver worth less than the paper it replaces, when the paper itself is at a discount of one-eighth as compared with gold. Throughout the commercial world there is but one standard of value and that is gold, measuring all commodities, silver included, and any attempt to substitute anything for gold, even though it be metallic, whether silver, copper, or iron at a higher rate than its true value in gold, is to rob somebody of some portion of his existing property.

WHO WILL BE ROBBED?

And who, Mr. Chairman, will be robbed and who will get the benefit of the fraud? The fractional currency is essentially the poor man's money. The bulk of it at any one time is in the actual possession of the laboring classes of this country. If you take away from them what is worth eighty-seven and one-half cents in gold and replace it with what is worth only eighty-two and five-eighth cents, you rob the working classes of nearly 5 per cent., five cents out of every dollar of their scanty possessions. No human device can ever prevent debased money when redundant from falling to its true value as compared with other commodities. The dollar may be still called a dollar, but the adulteration not apparent on its face will betray itself in the increased price of every commodity which the poor man's family consumes. Says Adam Smith:

The nominal sum which constitues the market price of every commodity is necessarily regulated, not so much by the quantity of silver, which according to the standard ought to be contained in it, as by that which it is found by experience actually is contained in it.— Wealth of Nations, book 1, chapter 11.

But we shall be told that this advance in the price of what he needs, will be compensated by a corresponding advance in his daily wages. In times of great activity, when the demand for labor exceeds the supply, this might and probably would be true, but in times like the present, when men stand idle "all the day long," seektimes like the present, when men stand idle "all the day long," seeking for work, there would be no advance in wages, and the laborer, now so poorly paid and so badly pinched, will be the sole sufferer. The result is the old story, that the "rich man's field is fertilized by the sweat of the poor man's brow." Of all devices for making the rich richer and the poor poorer, the debasement of the currency is the most ingenious, the most fertile, and the most successful. The victous results of such currency are too well known to need elaboration at my hand, but it would be easy to fill the RECORD with citations from the greatest authorities in history and finance. Let one from Man the greatest authorities in history and finance. Let one from Macaulay suffice:

The evils produced by this state of the currency were not such as have generally been thought worthy to occupy a prominent place in history. Yet it may well be doubted whether all the misery which had been inflicted on the English nation in a quarter of a century by bad kings, bad ministers, bad Parliaments, and bad judges, was equal to the misery caused in a single year by bad crowns and bad shillings. Those events which furnish the best themes for pathetic or indignant eloquence are not always those which most affect the happiness of the great body of the people. The misgovernment of Charles and James, gross as it had been, had not prevented the common business of life from going steadily and prosperously on. * * * But when the great instrument of exchange became thoroughly deranged, all trade, all industry, were smitten as with a palsy. The evil was felt daily and hourly in almost every place and by almost every class; in the dairy and on the threshing-floor, by the anvil and by the loom, on the billows of the ocean and in the depths of the mine, nothing could be purchased without a dispute. Over every counter there was a wrangling from morning to night. The workman and his employer had a quarrel as regularly as the Saturday came round. * * *

But the evil does not stop with the daily transactions of the poorer

But the evil does not stop with the daily transactions of the poorer classes. Although we call them "the poorer classes," they are nevertheless great capitalists in the aggregation of their humble savings. They own mainly the deposits in the savings-banks, which in my own State (New York) have now reached the enormous sum of $315,000,000. I regret that my time has not permitted me to procure the exact figures as to the number of deposits and withdrawals of $5 and less during the year; but my knowledge of these banks justifies me in saying that the aggregate of such entries is very large. If the whole $315,000,000 should be withdrawn in sums of $5 or less, paid in silver, the loss to the depositors would amount to over $15,000,000 in the single State of New York alone.

DEPRECIATION OF CURRENCY.

But, Mr. Chairman, why need I elaborate this proposition, which only needs to be stated to secure the assent of every intelligent member of this House? No one here wants to legislate for a depreciated currency, and we all profess to be striving to give the country a better, that is, a more valuable currency, one which will purchase more and not less gold to the dollar. The insuperable objection to the pending bill is that it gives us a currency still more depreciated than the one we have; one that will, in other words, purchase less gold to the dollar. But, besides being now depreciated, it is liable to great and sudden fluctuations, whereby it may suddenly disappear from public use, and cause the loss of the entire cost of its coinage; or, if this does not happen, depreciate so rapidly as to rob the poor of their subsistence and of their savings. It is following up in time of peace, when there is no call for it, the same policy which in time of war caused the passage of the legal-tender act, whereby the creditor class was taxed for the benefit of the debtor, resulting in the practical transfer of the whole debt of the people to the Government, and in the actual spoliation of all persons living on annuities and other fixed incomes. The loss, the distress, and the desolation caused by this act will not pass away so long as any one of the present generation of men shall But, Mr. Chairman, why need I elaborate this proposition, which only survive. But it was perhaps a necessary incident to the preservation of "the life of the nation." The life of the nation is no longer in peril. Let us therefore refrain from further legislation, however covert, in the direction of confiscation, and especially of the hardearned savings of the poor.

The bill now pending means depreciated currency; therefore it means confiscation; therefore it is unjust and unwise, and should have no favor from either side of this House. And yet I can understand why it may receive the republican vote, because it is the only method by which they can transfer the responsibility of the blunders of last year to the democratic party; but why any democrat should vote for it, unless he be so rabid an inflationist in principle that he prefers something less valuable than paper money, utterly passes my

What, then, should be done? There is in truth but one straightforward road out of the scrape. "If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out." The resumption law, so far as it relates to the coinage of silver, was a blunder; the purchase of the silver bullion was a blunder, and an expensive one; the coinage of this bullion is a blunder, the best remedy for which is to sell the silver for what it will bring and save the further loss which will result from its almost certain continued fall in price. The Big Bonanza has already yielded $273,000,000, which has caused a fall of four pence per ounce in four months. Its which has caused a fall of four pence per ounce in four months. Its yield is increasing daily. It is estimated that the California Company alone have $300,000,000 in sight. Two silver-clad Senators have already taken their seats in the adjoining Chamber, and there are four more said to have the necessary qualifications for promotion to the same high dignity as soon as there are vacancies. A fall of one penny per ounce means a loss of $800,000 on the $40,000,000 required for our minor currency. Unless the silver lining to the cloud hanging over the country is a delusion, the fall of saveral paperies per ounce in minor currency. Unless the silver lining to the cloud hanging over the country is a delusion, the fall of several pennies per ounce is inevitable, just as surely as the dividend on Consolidated Virginia shall be continued and those on California shall commence. It is no answer to this statement that the price of silver is to-day a little higher in London, and may possibly go back to fifty-five or fifty-six pence per ounce. This only shows the instability of its value, and the peculiar infelicity of the present time for attempting to put it into circulation. When it has settled down to something like a steady price, and we are prepared to resume specie payments gensteady price, and we are prepared to resume specie payments generally, subsidiary silver coins will as of old, if not redundant in amount, fill a nseful and necessary place in the currency of this as of other commercial nations. But meanwhile let the nation do what any sensible man of business would do, get rid of a commodity which is sure to fall, and above all, let the democrats of this House reject this white elephant of silver which the republicans offer to their acceptance. Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes.

There is, indeed, one other alternative, not so wise as to be rid of the silver altogether, until the general resumption of specie payments, but to which under the circumstances assent might be given. The silver already coined might be paid out, taking the chances of its circulation, or possibly of its being hoarded by the poorer classes to some extent. If by the rise in gold or in the price of silver it should be exported, the country will still possess a reasonable supply of fractions. tional paper currency by which its current operations might be carried on under difficulties until the supply could be increased, but to purchase and coin any more silver seems to me a waste of the public money and an idle experiment which should not be tolerated. So long as the silver coin is worth less than the fractional currency, and is not in excess of the absolute needs of the community, it will continue to circulate without raising prices upon the poor, just as any money to-kens, no matter of what material made, will to a limited extent cir-culate in any community without regard to their intrinsic value. But the moment there appears to be an excess of such tokens, they will in reality lose their fictitious value, and although they will be passed at their face, the price of everything they buy will advance.

To show the danger, however, even of issuing the amount of silver now in the Mint, let me call the attention of the House to the following extracts from the Evening Post and the London Times of yester-

FINANCE AND TRADE.

The following shows the value in gold of $100 greenbacks (Treasury notes, including fractional currency and national-bank notes) at twelve o'clock to-day, and at the same hour of the days named:

March 15, $87.33; March 14, $87.05; March 13, $87.24; March 11, $87.24; March 10, $87.33; March 9, $87.24.

The value in gold of $100 subsidiary silver coin, called big bonanza currency, is today $85.53.

day $5.53.

The price of silver in London has advanced to 54d. per ounce, a rise of 1gd. inside a week. The New York equivalent for this is $1.189 gold per ounce, or deducting freight, insurance, &c., about $1.182 per ounce. Last week the price was as low s $1.14 per ounce. The Herald this morning contains the following dispatch from London:

"LONDON, March 14, 1876.

"The Pall Mall Gazette this evening has a special telegram from Berlin, which states that the German government contemplates a postponement of the proposed demonetization of silver in consequence of its depreciation of value, which will involve a loss to the treasury of several millions of marks."

If the Berlin advices of the Pall Mall Gazette are true there is no reason why the price of silver in London should not at least return to the prices current last year, the lowest of which was 55½d. per ounce. As we showed on Monday, if silver in London advances to even 55d. (it now being 54½d.) and gold here remains at 114½, the big bonanza currency (subsidiary silver coin) will be taken for export.

The question may be asked, What harm will be done if it is exported? The answer is this: Under existing laws the Treasury is directed to issue 5 per cent. bonds to enable the Director of the Mint to buy silver. If enough silver is bought to entirely replace the fractional notes, (over $40,000,000.) and this subsidiary coin is exported, then the Treasury is, under the law, to issue more bonds and the Director buy more silver, and so on ad infinitum. It is within reason to suppose that $100,000,000 of 5 per cent. bonds may be issued in this way, and then the country not have enough subsidiary silver coin left in it to serve the purposes of small change. It is unnecessary to point out that this would be very acceptable to the big bonanza people, as it would give them a steady market for their products and a customer not disposed to haggle about the price. The interests of the public, however, require that this silver business shall be stopped now, and that, respecting the silver coin on hand, it shall be disposed of in the way which will entail the least loss on the Government.

As a sanitary measure, the substitution of silver for fractional notes is perhaps defensible; as a financial measure there is neither justification nor excuse for it, at least so far as public considerations are involved.

LONDON, Tuesday, March 14, 1876.

The Times this morning in its financial article says:

The Times this morning in its financial article says:

"Bar silver was in strong demand yesterday, and in the absence of supplies was nominally quoted at 53½ to 53½ pence per ounce. The more the circumstances under which the fall in silver has occurred are considered, the clearer does it become that they could hardly have been more unfavorable to permanent recovery. Apart from the diminished demand for export to the East, the demonetization by Germany, the temporary stoppage by several nations of their mints, and the increased production of mines, it seems to be evident that silver, as a standard of value, either in combination with gold or by itself, has had its day in Europe. To attempt to force this country into using it again as a legal tender side by side with gold is as impossible as to restore the old coaches in the place of railways."

Finally, Mr. Chairman, let me say that I have spoken but to little purpose if I have not made it clear that, while my objections to this bill rest upon the eternal principles of truth and justice and have been made in the interests of sound legislation, the plea which I have addressed to the House has been made mainly in behalf of the laboraddressed to the House has been made marnly in behalf of the labor-ing classes of this country. I shall not take the position of a dema-gogue, and claim to be more devoted to the claims and rights of labor than other gentlemen on the floor of this House. While I will yield to no man in my desire to promote the interests of labor, I believe that every member on both sides is governed by the same desire, especially in a season of such manifest distress. But I have been driven to make these remarks in order that I may satisfy my own conscience and redeem the pledge which I made to my constituents before I received their votes as their Representative.

During my canvass I was brought face to face with many thousands of men who live by the daily labor of their hands. Many delegations of these men called upon me personally, and I was touched beyond measure by the almost universal expression of their hopes and their wishes. They told me that they were not going to vote for me because I was a democrat and they were democrats, nor because I had made them any contributions of money, or had demoralized them with free liquor, nor because I belonged to them and had to suffer with them, but because they believed that the working classes had been cursed with bad legislation, which interfered with a just distribution of the proceeds of labor; that every time a law was passed affecting their interests it was sure to contain some provision which in a covert way tended sooner or later to deprive them of their just dues; and they came to me as a man who was accustomed to study these questhey came to me as a man who was accustomed to study these questions and would have the courage to stand up in this House and resist all legislation, coming no matter from which side, democratic or republican, which might tend to their injury or to the restriction of their just rights under the laws of nature. The simple confidence of these honest and trusting souls went to my heart. Once already it has been my duty and my privilege to protest against any narrowing up of the field for employment by the restriction of American commerce, and this day I raise my voice in pursuance of my pledge in solemn warning against legislation which will tend to rob the laboring classes, upon whose shoulders rest the pillars of the state of any ing classes, upon whose shoulders rest the pillars of the state, of any portion of the just compensation of their toil.

During the delivery of the above speech, the time of Mr. Hewitt, of New York, having expired,

Mr. HOLMAN said: I hope there will be no objection to allowing the gentleman a further extension of ten minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope 'hat two hours' additional debate will be allowed.

Mr. RANDALL. The House alone has the power to extend the time for debate, but I am quite willing that all the discussion which may be necessary to enable us to come to a conclusion on this subject shall be had.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition before the House is that unanimous consent be given to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hew-ITT] to extend his remarks for ten minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope he will have unlimited time.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest that his time be extended for fifteen min-ntes. I like the silvery ring of this political screed, and I hope the gentleman will have full time allowed him.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the gentleman's time will be extended for ten minutes.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Even if fifteen minutes be allowed it will not be sufficient to enable the gentleman to finish his remarks.

Mr. HOSKINS. I hope his time will be extended indefinitely.

There was no objection; and the time of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, war extended for fifteen minutes.

When Mr. HEWITT, of New York, referred, as above, to the expenditure of $250,000 additional by the Printing and Engraving Bureau, Mr. GARFIELD said: The amendment was introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and I do not think there was any clerical error about it.

Mr. RANDALL. I made no mistake.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think there was no mistake in that.
Mr. RANDALL. I read from a paper furnished me by the Printing Bureau, and which I am willing to have read again if necessary. The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield any

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I only know that $250,000 was expended in the Printing Bureau owing to some unnecessary legislation.

Mr. RANDALL. I can explain that fully if you will permit me to do so. The law last year provided for three plate-printings, three impressions, and required the Secretary of the Treasury to have an extra plate for the work, which has heretofore been done by what is known as the surface process; and that did increase the expenditures to about the amount named. The Secretary of the Treasury had to about the amount named. The Secretary of the Treasury nau never before printed these notes except in an economic manner as to the sales. This mode required an additional expenditure of $250,000, and if we enter again into the printing of fractional currency that expenditure will be necessary. Under the law of last session three plate-printings were required. If the House should at this session determine to continue the issue of this fractional currency, then the committee would recommend that the old practice of surface-printing be returned to. The amendment was offered in the Senate and confirmed by a conference committee.

VENTILATION OF THE HALL.

Mr. KELLEY. I want to ask, not only in my own name but in the name of a number of gentlemen sitting around me, that the Door-keeper be directed to open some of the doors in this box.

The CHAIRMAN. The Doorkeeper informs the Chair that he has already ordered the doors to be opened.

SUBSIDIARY SILVER COIN.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr.

HEWITT] has again expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope his time will be extended until he finishes his remarks.

There was no objection; and Mr. HEWITT continued and completed his remarks as printed above.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee now rise in order to obtain from the House an extension of time for general debate upon

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by the House for general debate on this bill has not yet expired, and will not expire for half an hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to get rid of the annoyance of constantly extending the time of gentlemen on the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Unanimous consent in the committee may accomplish the same purpose. It is not necessary to go through the formality of the committee rising in order to reach the object the gentleman has in view.

Then I ask unanimous consent that the time for Mr. RANDALL. general debate in Committee of the Whole be extended for two hours beyond the limit fixed by order of the House

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest that the committee has no power to change the order of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Kelley,] who is next entitled to the floor, can proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think we had better rise, and determine this

Mr. HOLMAN. We can accomplish the same purpose by unanimous consent in committee. The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr.

ARADALL] submit the motion that the committee now rise?

Mr. RANDALL. That was my motion originally; but some gentlemen suggested that the object could be accomplished in committee by unanimous consent. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. Hunton taking the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SAYLER reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department and for the issue of silver coin of the United States in place of fractional currency, and had come to no resolution

Mr. RANDALL. I now move—
Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that he now simply ask the House to remove the limit for general debate and not to fix any limit until to-morrow morning.

Mr. RANDALL. And let the limit of speeches to ten minutes each continue as already offered.

Mr. GARFIELD. Take away all limit of general debate. Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to take away the limit of ten minutes, so that every member who obtains the floor can speak for an hour.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not mean that; but I mean to fix no time mr. GARTIELD. I do not mean that; but I mean to ix no time now for the close of general debate.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. KELLEY. Allow me to suggest to my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] that there will probably be no more important bill than this in the discussion it will invite. I think that he had better allow for to-day a rather free range in the discussion of this bill. how long it will take me to say all that I have to say. I do not know The fact that I am here to speak in my present condition of health is evidence of my earnestness on this question. I do think the discussion will not take a wide range, but that it will be as important in its character as the discussion upon any bill that will be brought into this House.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object to gentlemen roaming and rambling as much as they please about this one single simple proposition of substituting silver coin for fractional currency; but for the sake of the Bureau, for the sake of preventing what is apprehended now, a scarcity of change, I want this question to be determined as soon as possible.

Mr. KELLEY. I quite agree with my colleague in that respect. I think it very important that there should be an early determination of this question.

Mr. RANDALL. Besides, there is another view to take of this matter. The people who have been suspended in this Bureau should be quickly made aware whether they can be re-instated or whether their removal is to be permanent.

Mr. KELLEY. I agree to that.
Mr. RANDALL. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the limit of two hours was fixed as the time for general debate upon the bill now in Committee of the Whole, so that general debate shall continue without limit, under the ten-minute rule, until the further order of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. Say fifteen minutes.
Mr. RANDALL. Very well. I am willing to extend the time for speeches to fifteen minutes each.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the motion to limit the time for general debate. I now move that the rule be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the bill for the issue of silver coin in place of fractional currency. And pending that motion I move that all speeches thereon be limited to fifteen minutes each.

The motion to limit speeches to fifteen minutes each was agreed to, and the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole was also agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SAYLER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department and for the issue of silver coin of the United States in place of fractional currency.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, general debate upon this bill is limited to speeches of fifteen minutes each, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] is entitled to the floor.

from Pennsylvania [Mr. Kelley] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. Kelley. Mr. Chairman, the fact that I attempt to address the committee is evidence of my earnest desire that the considerations involved in this bill may be understood and appreciated. I agree with my colleague [Mr. Randall] as to the importance of appropriating money to restore the production of fractional currency and to re-employ as soon as possible, if they are to be re-employed, the people now furloughed and in idleness.

But this bill involves very grave considerations. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hewitt,] in so far as he has dwelt upon the fluctuations in the price of silver during the year, has verified the predictions I made when the bill providing for the purchase and coining of silver was under discussion, and that I had made in newspapers over my proper signature when it was first proposed. Yet he has presented fully to the committee but one of the horns of the dilemma, and alluded but incidentally to the other.

but incidentally to the other.

No American staple is depreciating so rapidly in current market value as silver. The causes of the depreciation are manifold. It is due not only to the enormous production of the great Bonanza mines, nor to the recent disclosure of the fact that the Uncomphagre range in southern or middle Colorado is likely to yield larger amounts of silver than any of the mines of Nevada, for beyond and more potent than these causes has been the demonetization of silver by Germany, Holland, Sweden, Denmark, and Japan, and the closing of the mints of the Latin monetary union against the coinage of silver. These causes are supplemented by the results of the impoverishment of the people, which has destroyed the market for silver for manufacture into articles of utility and beauty, and enabled those who produce such articles to buy silver-ware at pawnbrokers', sheriffs', or marshals' sales, in all the forms of elegance into which it enters into private use, at less per ounce of fine silver than they can in the general bullion market.

This discussion is not upon money proper, but upon our subsidiary coins, which all nations regard as mere tokens, the intrinsic value of which they make several per cent. below their nominal or face value, and never make legal-tender for a considerable sum. In so far as foreign trade is concerned they are not regarded as money, but are a mere medium of exchange among the people of the nation by the government of which they are issued. Though on this minor element of money the discussion is furnishing us with pregnant illustrations of the fact that money is a national institution, that it depends upon decrees of government, and that this is equally true whether it be of gold, of silver, or of paper, and that the special value of gold and silver is dependent on their use or distance as money. ver is dependent on their use or disuse as money.

My theoretic friends around me, who bring to us the dogmas of the school of economists to which they are attached and speak ex-cathedra as they would to a class of collegians, tell us that gold and silver are the only invariable standards of value. Sir, standards are fixed, do not fluctuate, are not given to vicissitudes, do not vary; and yet these gentlemen, accepting as they do Michel Chevalier as a living teacher of their school and the late Richard Cobden as one of its great masters, are referred to the Congressional Library to find Chevalier's book on the Probable Fall of Gold, in the third edition of Cobden's translation, published in London, Manchester, and Edinburgh in 1859, when, owing to the general use of silver as money and the immense influx of gold from California and Australia, that metal, unchanging standard as it was, sank so rapidly in comparison with silver that Chevalier hastened to admonish the French government that it must protect the people against the effect of its depreciation by the establishment of an exclusively silver coinage, and Cobden hastened to translate the book and publish it in the cities I have named, whereby it was run to a third edition by 1859. To those who believe that an unchangeable standard of value can be found in a merchantable commodity the value of which is constantly changing, I spe-cially recommend chapter 4 of section 4 of this work. But things have changed and the other standard, poor silver, has been demonetized, disowned, and is disclaimed even by my friend who just addressed us, who said it would be robbery to coin as legal tender that which is to all India, to nearly two-thirds of the people of the world, their unvarying standard of value. Pretty standards are these commodities which dance so gay a dance in change of value!

But this is apart from the main discussion. The speech of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Wells,] which was, as he is absent, read from the Clerk's desk, gives us details taken from the reports of the Director of the Mint and the Comptroller of the Currency. It will therefore be well to ascertain the value of these reports. Sir, events recently developed have made those of us whose faces are most wrinkled by age feel that close observation would show that we were blushing; and I have heard nothing in the way of discreditable disclosure that pained me so much or caused the blush of shame to so mantle my cheek as reading the reports of the Director of the Mint and of the Comptroller of the Currency; the study of the annual reports of the Comptroller proves that he embodies in his own person and character the disinterested patriotism of the Vicar of Bray and the progressive philosophy of Demetrius the silversmith. The report of the Director of the Mint is little more than an advertisement of old Townsend's genuine sarsaparilla. [Laughter.] It is a pamphlet molded upon the advertising pamphlets of that physician, whose sands of life are nearly run. Pages of it are covered with evidence of the increasing value of the stock of the mines on the Comstock lode, and its bulk is swollen so that it is inconvenient for carriage by the insertion of maps of mines and their machinery, intended to demonstrate the truth of his advice to the people that if they want to buy stock in the Comstock mines they had better do it at once. [Laughter.]

Turning to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, you will find that while he is severe upon all who now differ with him in opinion, his severity falls not more harshly upon any dissenter than it does upon the doctrines uttered by John Jay Knox, Comptroller of the Currency, while President Grant still favored the maintenance of a flexible currency; for in a preceding report he had reproduced what he had said in a report that preceded that, urging Congress to re-establish, if it did not maintain, a system of temporary loans or convertible bonds. And now since the President has changed his opinion on that subject, he sees nothing so obnoxious to the life of our country or the prosperity of the people as the propositions he had thus persistently maintained. Therefore I ask gentlemen, before accepting any statement made in those reports, to consider them and see whether they are not the discreditable things I have described.

The Director of the Mint tells us that all the available Treasury vaults are gorged with silver coin, and he dilates upon the necessity of constructing new vaults to contain the coins yet to be manufactured. We must, he says, have $40,000,000 of these tokens before we can begin to issue them. Why, sir, if they would stay in circulation when put out, could they not put them out as fast as they were made, and take in a like amount of that which they were to substitute, until they had gradually filled the channels for small change? Why wait until the "Big Bonanza" owners have sold and we have converted $40,000,000 of their depreciating commodity into the 5 per cent. goldbearing bonds of a nation whose credit stands at 4 per cent. in the markets of the world? Sir, the reason was that to put it out would demonstrate the folly of the thing. If silver was then of a value which would yield a profit on its export, it would go abroad as fast as it was emitted; it would go into the melting-pot; at any rate it would disappear and put an end to the experiment, because by issuing coined substitutes for the fractional currency now in use and destroying the notes thus called in would, if the coins were exported or melted, bring the people to a condition in which they would have no subsidiary currency for small transactions, such as paying the boot-black, or for a carride, or for any other of the minor but most frequent commercial exchanges of life.

But there is, as I have intimated, another horn to our dilemma. is this. If silver continues to depreciate, we will have private manufactories of dimes, twenty-cent pieces, quarters of dollars, and half dollars established all over the country, and especially in the neighborhood of the "Big Bonnaza." Manufacturers of these articles will then be able to make them of full standard value; nay, more, whenever ilver shall depreciate a little further, they can give in their private dimes and double dimes and half dollars a percentage more of silver than the Government does, and still have a more profitable business than almost any other branch of industry. They, and not the Gov-ernment, will have the benefit of the seigniorage upon the subsidiary coinage, and this result, which neither the Director of the Mint nor the Comptroller of the Currency points out will be felt, namely, that when the coins, whether issued from the Mint or private factories, are worn to the extent of 20 or 25 per cent., or as was the case with the English subsidiary coinage when it had not been renewed for a century, 50 per cent., the Government must take it in at its full value and recoin it; that modern Issacher the American people bearing the burden.

The two horns of the dilemma are before us, and no man can tell upon which we are most likely to alight if we pass this bill. I have been studying the subject. I had with these papers in this envelope, until I was foolish enough to lend them to some gentleman who will probably upon this notice restore them, financial articles on the silver question from the Englishman, published at Calcutta, as late as January 14, and an elaborate editorial on the same subject from the Two Republics, the official organ of the Government at the city of Mexico. They were each instructive, and I regret that I cannot bring them fully to the attention of the committee. I am however able to say that the financial editor of the Englishman said:

No power on earth can check the depreciation of any marketable commodity that is largely increased in production as compared with any other that is stationary or becoming scarcer.

And again-

Nothing, so far as we can see, will check the gulf that is gradually dividing gold rom silver, if the relative production of each metal is to go on as it has been doing and as it is likely to do. A point must in time be reached at which it will not pay so the city of the control of the cont to raise silver.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHITE. I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. For what length of time?

Mr. RANDALL. Fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to extending the gentleman's time fifteen minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. The papers of yesterday brought us information that the consequences of the contraction of the money of the empire by the demonetization of silver upon the industries of the people and the revenues of the government has induced the Emperor of Germany to order the continuance of the old thaler as legal tender. That incorder the continuance of the old thaler as legal tender. to order the continuance of the old thaler as legal tender. That in-telligence had, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] showed us, the effect of putting up the price of silver one pence an ounce for fine silver.

There are difficulties in comparing the official papers before me with the prices quoted by the gentleman, because these papers give the price of standard while he spoke of that of fine silver. Here is the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made February 10, 1876, in response to a resolution of the House of January 24, 1876, requesting a response to a resolution of the House of January 24, 1876, requesting a statement of the amount of coin in the Treasury at the close of business on December 31, 1875, together with the dates and price of the several purchases of silver and the amount of gold-bearing bonds exchanged for them under the act of January 14, 1875. It shows (and it should be borne in mind that it speaks of standard silver and not of fine silver; that is, of silver alloyed to the standard of our subsidiary coins) that the Treasury began buying silver on February 5, 1875, and then paid per ounce $1.132. As soon as it was known that the Government had become a purchaser, the Bonanza people put up the price to $1.134, at which they kept it till February 13, when foreign silver, chiefly German coin, began to flow into our markets, and nearly five hundred thousand dollars' worth was purchased at $1.131. But to trace the decline in price would be tedious. It will answer my purpose to say that the last reported purchase, that of September 18, 1875, was at $1.11, a depreciation of two cents and two mills. Since then, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] has let us know, we have been able to buy it, if I understood him correctly, at $1.03. May I ask the gentleman at what we can buy it

Mr. RANDALL. I think it depreciated from causes which I can explain, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. KELLEY. I merely want the fact as to the lowest price.

Mr. RANDALL. As I understand, it reached as low as 102½ or 103, and has fluctuated up to 106; so that, if I were to speak on the subject to-day, I would say that it is somewhere between 103 and 106.

Mr. KELLEY. That is for standard silver. Now I have the San Francisco rates for fine silver from the 3d of January to the 26th of

On the 3d of January the gold value of fine silver per ounce was $1.22. One dollar in legal-tender fractional-currency notes was then worth two mills and four-tenths of a mill more than two silver half dollars. On the 26th of February fine silver had sunk to $1.16; and legal-tender fractional notes were worth 3.9 per cent. more than our silver coins of like denomination. The depreciation since that time has been far more rapid than it had been at any previous period.

Mr. Chairman, when Mrs. Toodles reports to her exemplary husband her purchase of a door-plate bearing the name of a man named Thompson—Thompson with a "p"—which she had bought because it might come of use some time if by chance she should survive poor, dear $\begin{array}{l} \Gammaoodles, the\ popular\ impression\ is\ that, looking\ to\ the\ interest\ account,\\ she\ did\ not\ make\ a\ good\ investment\ of\ her\ husband's\ funds.\ And\\ yet\ I\ do\ not\ know\ that\ it\ was\ not\ a\ wise\ one\ in\ comparison\ with\ our \end{array}$ investment of 5 per cent. gold-bearing bonds in a commodity that has thus rapidly depreciated. For the door-plate of Thompson with a "p" might possibly find a purchaser at a reasonable price, but we are increasing our oppressive gold indebtedness in order to buy an article against which the markets of the world are being closed by reason of its general disuse as money and consequent steady depreciation, and which is so useless to us that we must construct new vaults in which to store it.

India herself finds that she is unable to retain her share of the trade of the world while she retains silver as her legal tender, and the rupee, a silver coin which represented two English shillings, was, on the 21st of February, worth but  $1s.\ 8^s_4d.$ ; which was a fall in sixteen days from  $1s.\ 9^s_4d$ . to  $1s.\ 8^s_4d$ .

It is therefore gravely proposed that India shall abandon the use of silver, but she finds two difficulties in the way. The first is that she has not the means with which to buy the necessary amount of gold, for she must have $500,000,000 on hand when she undertakes to substitute gold coins for her silver ones. But, secondly, she finds the same difficulty that we encounter; that is, that if we were ready to purchase a few hundred millions of gold there is nobody who has it to sell. With the monetization of gold by Germany and the demonetization of silver by her and Holland and Sweden and Denmark and the Latin league, the great gold-using nations are compelled to retain as a basis for their currency extraordinary amounts of that metal, so that the Bank of England, which had never held one hundred and fifty millions of dollars, now holds largely over one hundred and fifty millions; and the Bank of France holds the unparalleled sum of over four hundred millions. To obtain and hoard these vast amounts they have squeezed Germany out of nearly all these vast amounts they have squeezed Germany out of nearly all the new gold marks she has issued, and have forced her to tolerate the use as legal-tender of her recently demonetized thaler. The gold of the world is demanded by the great creditor nations; and in order that France and England may leave the minor countries with which they trade a gold basis for their currency, they must drive Germany back to the use of silver and paper. Yet here we are, because the own-ers of the Big Bonanza find the price of their commodity declining, undertaking to bull silver against the nations of the world, and to save a few citizens from possible bankruptcy by increasing our gold indebtedness. A more quixotic movement no legislative body ever went into.

In this connection I may not inappropriately remark, sir, that In this connection I may not inappropriately remark, sir, that when within four weeks the purchase of the Suez Canal was under discussion in the British Parliament, a gentleman inquired whether the statutes for the punishment of parliamentary contractors were still in force, and Mr. Anselm Rothschild—I do not know that I give the first name of the gentleman correctly—arose and vindicated his right to be in the British legislature by proving, not that he was not an owner in the Big Bonanza, but that he did not belong to the firm that had sold shares of stock in the Suez Canal to the Government.

Mr. GARRIELD been made a remark in his seat inaudible at the

Mr. GARFIELD here made a remark in his seat inaudible at the reporters' desk, to which Mr. KELLEY replied.

Mr. KELLEY. I am having a little side discussion as to whether any member of the House or Senator can possibly own stock in the Bonanza or other Comstock mines. I do not know.

Mr. RANDALL. I can answer for myself that I own stock in noth-

Mr. KELLEY. God bless you! I never suspected you of being in the Big Bonanza. I know that you are very near as poor as I am; and there is not required a much better certificate of integrity than you and I have on that score. But if you lived in San Francisco and represented the Big Bonanza State here or in the other House, I might suspect you of owning shares.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to say just there that I find in the Constitution of my country that silver is a legal tender, and I want to approach to that. Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. KELLEY. Are you going to pay bonds with it?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir. I am going to approach to specie payments as fast as I can without injury to the industries of the country, and I want to take the broad view of this question that this introduction of silver has no connection with the resumption of gold as duction of silver has no connection with the resumption of gold as between the nations.

Mr. KELLEY. O! I understand that!

Mr. RANDALL. But except in so far as this, that I believe there would be a sentiment created among the people, and that when they have the handling of silver they may want by some means to go a little further and handle gold.

Mr. KELLEY. In this matter we want sense, not sentiment. I should, perhaps, Mr. Chairman, have gone further than I did in disclaiming any suspicion that my colleague was interested in the Big Bonanza. I do not suspect that any member of this body is so situ-Bonanza. I do not suspect that any member of this body is so situated. I know that we are all incorruptible. I was only speaking of what might happen.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I know myself, as I suppose I do, and that is what the people say you should do.

Mr. KELLEY. There is no specie payment in this; for if my colleague will go to Canada and take $10 in ten-cent notes of our fractional currency and $10 in silver dimes, he will find that he can buy with the notes, the paper money, more of any commodity than he can with the same number of silver dimes. I learned this fact from commercial articles in the Canadian papers and the statement of one of

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. KELLEY. I would ask the House to give me a few minutes ore. I understood that my friend from Iowa, [Mr. OLIVER,] who more. is to follow me, has a few minutes to spare, which he is willing to yield me.

Mr. OLIVER. I thought the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania had been indefinitely extended.

The CHAIRMAN. It was not; that was not the order of the committee; but if there be no objection the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be extended. No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

Mr. KELLEY. Not knowing how much time would be allowed me,

Mr. KELLEY. Not knowing how much time would be allowed me, I have spoken in a very random way.

In order to get silver we had prior to the 31st of December, 1875, paid $574,017 in gold interest on bonds previously issued for its purchase, apart from the expense of converting it into coin. We then had some four millions of uncoined bullion. We are now asked to buy enough to require us to add$1,260,000 of annual gold interest to the amount already incurred. When you remember that the interest on a 5 per cent. twenty-year bond, without compounding, pays the sum of the principal in twenty years and leaves you in debt for the entire principal, you will find that we shall be paying two or three million dollars a year in gold for the privilege of using a currency which if it rises to a year in gold for the privilege of using a currency which if it rises to a given value will be exported, or if it sinks below a certain price will a given value will be exported, or if it sinks below a certain price will tempt counterfeiting, and enable the counterfeiter to give you better money than the Government issues. Will not this be paying too dear for so unreliable a whistle? What is it that oppresses the American people to-day? Why, sir, it is a system of absenteeism more destructive to American industry and enterprise than English absentees ever tive to American industry and enterprise than English absentees ever were to Ireland; a funding system by which our bonds pledging us to pay high rates of gold interest, pledging us to pay them every twenty years, and still to owe the sum of the principal in gold, are held by foreigners, and which thus takes from our industry and enterprise their life-blood; which is thus to be perpetuated and extended, by increasing our gold-bearing indebtedness in the vain hope of bulling silver against the nations of the world. This is what we have been ingeniously led into, and what this bill proposes.

They tell us—and by they I mean the Director of the Mint and the Compresses of the Courteness—of the cost of making paper freetings.

Comptroller of the Currency—of the cost of making paper fractional currency. They do not also tell us, sir, that there has been a gain of $10,000,000 to the Treasury in great part by loss or destruction notes. That has been a loss to each individual who lost any part of the sum, but a benefit to the Government. It is carried beyond the country in the pockets of travelers.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want the Government to make money in that way. Do you?

Mr. KELLEY. I will speak for myself. It is consumed in every fire; it sinks in every vessel that goes down carrying its living freight below the floods. I do not want the Government to make money in that way; but I want to remind the gentleman that five-cent pieces have also been lost, and ten-cent pieces, and quarters, and half dollars, and dollars; and that, when coins are lost, no one but the owners of gold or silver mines are benefited; the Government loses and the loss gold or silver mines are benefited; the Government loses, and the loss of the individual is not diminished.

Mr. RANDALL. These losses do not bear any relation whatever in amount as compared with rags.

Mr. KELLEY. "Rags" the money of your country, sir! [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. The fact is that coin lasts fifty years, while this currency which you want me to describe as the money of my country

A MEMBER. Hardly that.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, hardly that; and, furthermore, this money is lost in the main by poor people, for whom you have so much compassion. The loss of fractional currency is somewhat between seven and ten millions of dollars a year.

and ten millions of dollars a year.

Mr. KELLEY. So the Director of the Mint and the Comptroller tell us; but does that give us assurance as to the facts? My colleague would soothe the souls of the losers by robbing them of four cents on every dollar, by making them take silver with which they can buy but ninety-six cents' worth of commodities, of which they can buy one hundred cents' worth with the "rags" which saved his country in the hour of its greatest danger.

Mr. RANDALL. That is caused by the standard created by your own law, making a dollar in silver three hundred and eighty five and three-tenths grains.

three-tenths grains.

Mr. KELLEY. I tell the gentleman that you can buy with ten ten-cent rags more than you can with ten jingling silver dimes with ten-cent rags more than you can with ten jingling silver dimes with which he proposes to afflict the laboring people of the country.

Mr. HUBBELL. If that is so, why does not our American fractional currency go to Canada?

Mr. KELLEY. I asked my colleague whether he would pay the bonds in silver, and he said he would not. But it is proposed to make silver a legal tender for $10; and it is shrewdly suggested that it should be made a legal tender for $10. You would cheat the poor American, cheat the widow or the orphan who is entitled to $20, $30, $40, or even $99 semi-annually of interest by paying them depreciated silver; and when you come to pay the Rothschilds and the Barings, to whom you pay tens of thousands, you will see to it that they get gold. I do not believe in any such uneven-handed justice.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a ques-

Mr. KELLEY. Certainly.
Mr. RANDALL. Are you in favor of issuing such silver as we have on hand now coined and stamped?

Mr. KELLEY. I am in favor of issuing it or selling it; but I am opposed to taxing the farmer's and laborer's thews and sinews to buy gold to exchange for silver in order to rob them of a part of the value of the fractional currency that they now hold. Issue what silver coin you have—I should have come to that point—let it go; and if it disappears, substitute fractional notes for it again.

But when you remember that your Treasury, pledged to resume specie payments, holds but $13,000,000 of gold, and that a diminishing quantities in estimating the value of gold and silver, would it not be the part of wisdom to order the Secretary of the Treasury to stop in-creasing the gold debt of the country and the draught for gold to be paid to foreigners; to prohibit him from buying with gold-bearing bonds a commodity which, if some of the nations of the world do not soon remonetize it, may drop in value until pure nickel will stand on a par with it.

I prefer the proposed amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hewitt,] which is that the silver, both coin and bullion, shall be sold, that the Government pocket the loss already made rather than impose it upon the laboring classes and the business men of the country. I am anxious that the country should be supplied with fractional currency, that part of our currency that circulates most freely and changes hands most frequently. Now a word in a partisan

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me one question?
Mr. KELLEY. Certainly.
Mr. GARFIELD. I would inquire of the gentleman how his argument would fit the notion of allowing the five-cent nickels to remain in circulation as they do?

Mr. KELLEY. I do not ask the withdrawal of the five-cent nickel. Mr. GARFIELD. Why not?

Mr. KELLEY. Every man who takes it knows that it is but a token good for five cents, because the Government has made it money, and it is in limited amounts interchangeable for lawful money.

Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. RANDALL rose

Mr. KELLEY. Not two at a time, gentlemen, nor when you have led me on a false scent. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman is in favor of continuing the five-cent nickel because everybody takes it and nobody loses by it, how is the poor man to be swindled by taking a twenty-five-cent sil-

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will raise the question in this House whether we shall renew the issue of five-cent notes and call in the five-cent nickels, I will vote for it, because the notes were and would be full legal tender.

Mr. HOAR. I would ask the gentleman—

Mr. KELLEY One at a time now. Neither of them have intrinsic value; they serve to make exchanges. Do you ask, when you take a check for a thousand dollars on the credit of an individual, that it a check for a thousand dollars on the credit of an individual, that it shall have the intrinsic value of a thousand dollars? You know it has not. You know it is what my colleague calls our legal-tender money, "rags;" and yet you take a check for a thousand dollars or for ten thousand dollars. Why? Because you know that a sufficient credit lies behind it, and you also know it is not probable that the bank it is drawn upon will shut its doors before you will present it.

Mr. HOAR. Now, allow me a question.

Mr. KELLEY. Let me finish this illustration. If you take a baggage check and hand your trunk, containing tens of thousands of dollars.

gage check and hand your trunk, containing tens of thousands of dollars in value to some unknown man who bears the badge of an authorized and responsible company, do you ask that your check shall have the intrinsic value of your trunk? No. Why not? Because you know that it involves the responsibility of a credit abundantly able to remunerate you for the loss of your trunk.

Mr. HUBBELL. And when you ask that your check shall be re-

Mr. KELLEY. You get your trunk back or you get the value of it. I want the greenbacks made redeemable, and these gentlemen around me prohibit it. I want the Government to restore its faith to the American people, and prove to them that it is honest. It stands to-day degraded, disgraced, and dishonored in the eyes of such of the people as are not bondholders. It put out the legal-tender money under the express stipulation that it should be convertible into interest-bearing bonds. It floated the legal-tenders in that way into all the channels of trade. And then, meanly, dishonestly, and disgracefully, the Government withdrew its pledge and depreciated the people's money. I plead with gentlemen to make the greenback as it then was, convertible and interconvertible.

Mr. BLAINE. The greenback interconvertible! Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. O, no.

Mr. KELLEY. After it ceased to be convertible into 6 per cents you could exchange it for seven-thirties.

Mr. BLAINE. Not interconvertible in them.

Mr. KELLEY. You could exchange it into seven-thirties, giving you higher interest than the 6 per cents, and you could convert it into compound-interest notes, getting them from the Treasury. And with temporary loan certificates it was absolutely convertible and interconvertible, and the integrity and character of the Government require the restoration of such a provision of law.

[Here the hammer fell.]
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. BRIGHT. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to go on.
Mr. KELLEY. I have about concluded what I have to say. I willing to endeavor to answer the questions which gentlemen about me desire to ask.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman retains the floor, as I understand, for the purpose of answering a question which I wish to put. There is one respect in which I do not exactly understand his position. If you stamp something upon a piece of paper that has no value and compel the laboring-man to take it, I do not understand how you thereby do him a greater benefit than when you stamp precisely the same thing on a piece of silver, which has great value, and compel him to take it. How is it that the latter cheats the laboring-man, while the former does not?

Mr. KELLEY. I speak, sir, of facts rather than theories. I tell ou that to-day you can buy more gold with a greenback than with the same nominal amount in silver.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to put my question in another form? Suppose you take this piece of paper made by the Government—paper costing comparatively nothing—and tie this piece of silver to it or under it, would it be worth more or less to the poor man whom the gentleman says we are robbing? and if worth more, would it not continue to be worth just as much if you took away the

Mr. KELLEY. You have heard, Mr. Chairman, of the Scotch lord who did not want to pass a light guinea himself and gave it to his driver, with instructions to get it off if he could. After they had passed the next toll-gate Donald said to him, "Your lordship, I have gotten it off." "How?" "Ah, I put it between two farthings, and the man at the gate took it without noticing it!" That is the properition the goal lower would have me discuss whether if I inconsition. osition the gentleman would have me discuss, whether, if I ingeniously contrive to pass a greenback with a silver dollar tied to it, it would be worthless. The light guinea did not impair the value of the farthings that canceled it. the farthings that concealed it.

Mr. HOAR. My friend says that if you take away from the laboring man these stamped pieces of paper, which are worth nothing be-fore they are stamped, and give him in exchange the same stamp on a piece of silver which is of value all the world over, you have cheated

Mr. KELLEY. Now let us see whether this paper of the Government is "worth nothing but its stamp." If my friend has a thousand dollars of taxes to pay, that "worthless paper" will pay them. If he holds any other obligation of the Government—

Mr. HOAR. Are they paid by the Government? By whom are

Mr. HOAR. Are they paid by the Government! By whom are they paid?

Mr. KELLEY. O, I am not going to run into nice metaphysics. I answer with the facts of current history; with facts that these learned schoolmen cannot dispute. If judgment be obtained against a man in a court for $1,000, and the sheriff is about to seize his property, that "worthless paper" pays the debt and releases the property. If stocks be on sale in the market, that "worthless paper," those "rags," will buy and pay for them. In France, (where they are more honest or less foolish than we,) during even the time of the Commune, when the pétroleuses were burning the homes of the rich and the public buildings, gold never reached a premium of 3 per cent. in the irredeemable notes of the Bank of France. Why? Because, as I say, the French government was more honest or wiser than the Amer-

the irredeemable notes of the Bank of France. Why? Because, as I say, the French government was more honest or wiser than the American Government has shown itself, and made those notes a legal tender for all debts, public and private.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is, it always redeemed its notes.

Mr. KELLEY. It always received the money which it made the people receive. It receives its own paper for taxes, for government dues, and thus for the time being it demonetizes gold. It was our dishonoring of our own paper that called the "gold-room" of New York into existence, that brought thither the vampires of the world to fasten and fatten upon the industries of the country. It was the dishonesty and fatten upon the industries of the country. It was the dishonesty of the American Congress and Government in repudiating the money it created and forced the people to receive that has cost us the countless millions made and lost in the "gold-room" of New York and through its influence

Mr. HOAR. I want to ask my friend from Pennsylvania whether the "dishonesty of the American Government" in regard to its own paper is the "dishonesty" of refusing to redeem it on demand or the "dishonesty" of redeeming it on demand?

Mr. KELLEY. The Government and people would have been able to obtain gold in exchange for notes for the few purposes for which it would have been needed, as the Bank of France pays it voluntarily, if it had not transferred the products of industry and enterprise from every legitimate owner to the speculators of the "gold-room" in New York, by establishing two legal tenders, one of gold for duties on foreign imports and in payment of bonds, and one of paper for that patient ass the American people.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me now to put a question. If my friend will come down to a very small matter for a moment. I am very earn-I am very earnest in the hope that I may bring my friend down from his sixteen-foot horse to a very small matter. The gentleman said a while ago that it was an outrage upon the poor men, the widows and the orphans—those people for whom I admit he has always been so careful in his legislative career-to force upon them silver ten-cent pieces and quarlegislative career—to force upon them silver ten-cent pieces and quarters and half dollars of less value proportionately than the standard dollar of our country. Now I ask how it is that the five-cent pieces made from nickel coming from a mine close by the gentleman's district, which he knows all about, and which he has been so earnest in promoting, which is a "big bonanza" in its way—I admit the gentleman is in no way related to it except by neighborhood—I ask him how it is that we do not cheat the laboring man, the widow, and the orphan when we force upon them millions of five-cent nickel pieces which are worth just about one cent aniece. 20 per cent, of their face value when we force upon them millions of five-cent nickel pieces which are worth just about one cent apiece, 20 per cent. of their face value or I think considerably less; but if we give them a silver dime or quarter or half dollar, worth about 90 per cent. of its face and which passes for sums of $5 just as well as the five-cent pieces pass within their limit, we are cheating the people? How is it that silver is so dreadful and cruel a thing, and nickel, which the gentleman has championed here for the last ten years, is so good and blessed?

Mr. KELLEY. I hand the gentleman from Ohio the bill to have him refer to that part of it which relates to nickel coinage, and while he is finding it I will go on and say what I have to say. We are discussing this hill. [Langhter] I should like him to show me any.

he is finding it I will go on and say what I have to say. We are discussing this bill. [Laughter.] I should like him to show me anything in it that refers to nickel coinage. I am going to answer what is practical and pertains to the bill under consideration. Why is the greenback worth more than silver?

Mr. GARFIELD. I am not talking about silver.

Mr. KELLEY. I want to talk about it. I knew it was a small thing you were going to bring to my attention. I cannot get below the dime, because there is nothing less than that discussed in this

II. [Laughter.]
Mr. GARFIELD. But the other leads to nickel.
Mr. KELLEY. There is nothing less than a dime discussed in this

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. KELLEY.

Let me answer this question first. [Laughter.] Give me ten greenbacks, give me one hundred of them, and I will go to your Treasury and will get a one or a ten-dollar note for them. to your Treasury and will get a one or a ten-dollar note for them. Give me a thousand of them, and I will go to your Treasury and get a hundred-dollar note for them; and either of these notes will be a legal tender in payment of debt to any citizen of the United States or to any foreigner dwelling among us. Where is the provision for the redemption of your silver dimes? Can you change them for greenbacks at the Treasury?

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. KELLEY. One at a time. Where is the provision for the redemption of the silver dimes? You may hold them by the hogsheadful and you cannot pay more than $5 of them away in any one debt. Nor can you convert them into greenbacks at the Treasury. Therefore it is that the rags, yes the rags, [laughter,] the rags of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, are worth more in the man of the Committee on Appropriations, are worth more in the pocket-book of a man than his jingling silver pieces of like denomination.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. GARFIELD. What about the nickel, which is below ten cents?
Mr. KELLEY. Too small, sir. [Laughter.]
Mr. WHITE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether or not, if silver were made a legal tender, it would not answer all the gentleman's objections?

Mr. KELLEY. The chairman of the committee who is managing

Mr. KELLEY. The chairman of the committee who is managing this bill does not propose to make it a legal tender, and I am engaged on practical questions now. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. If the gentleman will allow me, I will ask him one question. Does he consider it justifiable to call the American people an ass since the New Hampshire election? [Laugh-

Mr. KELLEY. I was not up there; and if I am to believe the organ of my friend, the New York Tribune—

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Not my organ.

Mr. KELLEY. I say if I believe the gentleman's organ of opinion, I cannot say the American people who live in New Hampshire are an ass, for it says the republican speakers took the most money with them. I do not know how the election was carried, but the New York Tribuna with the same of the s York Tribune says it was the result of a purchase. [Laughter.] I do not, however, believe it, because I am sure my friend from Ohio carried it by his eloquence, and he did not talk about five-cent pieces either. [Laughter.]

I wish to get to my seat, but as I said I want to refer to the political aspect of this discussion and to remark that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hewitt] spoke as a democrat, and I speak as a republican. I opposed the passage of the bill authorizing the issue of gold bonds for the purchase of silver. I saw it was fraught with danger. I predicted that, if it passed, it would bring the administration to these halls demanding increase of taxation, and that increased revenue could only be drawn from the reduced production of the laboring people of the country. I said it would close factory, forge, and furnace; that it would diminish the price of the farmer's products; that it would spread bankruptcy throughout the land; that it would spew out of the country the little gold in it, and every one of my predictions has been verified, so that believing your Treasury held from $70,000,000 to $90,000,000 of gold the report lies before us showing that at this hour it has but $13,000,000.

Mr. GARFIELD rose.

Mr. KELLEY. No. By the purchase of silver adding two millions more annually to our gold payments by the issue of further bonds we may come to the day when even the Treasury of the United States may go to protest. Let us revive our industries—

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me ask the gentleman whether he did not in the same prophecy predict the Treasury would go to protest before Congress began?

Mr. KELLEY. Not at all; I never did. Mr. GARFIELD. I so understood him. Mr. KELLEY. You may have so understood me, but I never said I am not responsible for your comprehension; I am only respon-

Mr. GARFIELD. The newspapers so reported.
Mr. KELLEY. The facts are these: The editor of the Philadelphia Times, having heard that I had said the Government of the United States would go to protest or that the President would call Congress together to give it relief, sent one of his commissioners—I believe so the together to give it relief, sent one of his commissioners—I believe so the gentlemen of the press are called—to see me. I was glad to see him. He was an intelligent gentleman, and put his questions to me with point. I told him I had not said exactly that. I had, however, said that the revenues were running down; that they would run down; that the law had imposed duties upon the Secretary of the Treasury which, if he executed them with fidelity and with due regard to the sinking fund, would possibly bankrupt the Government, and that I regarded it as a not very remote possibility that the President might have to call Congress together before the regular day of meeting. have to call Congress together before the regular day of meeting.

The New York Tribune took me up and showed my utter ignorance and folly by saying the Secretary of the Treasury could avert such a possibility, for he had the right to issue 5 per cent. bonds to an unlimited amount. He was to take up thirty millions of bonds for the sinking fund, and I did not see the philosophy of taking up thirty millions for the sinking fund and issuing fifteen millions for the purchase of silver. I did not see that that would maintain the sinking fund interest. But the Scarter wild interest that the sinking fund interest. fund intact. But the Secretary did just that. He did not maintain the sinking fund. He did issue fifteen millions of bonds with which to purchase silver and retire greenbacks. And let us look at what would have been his condition if he had maintained the integrity of the sinking fund; thirteen millions of dollars in the Treasury and fifteen sinking fund; thirteen millions of dollars in the Treasury and fifteen millions of additional bonds outstanding. If he had maintained the integrity of the sinking fund and gone on to buy silver as he has done, and redeemed greenbacks as he has also done, your Treasury would be to-day minus in available unpledged gold over $2,000,000; and the President, seeing that sad condition coming, might, in his wisdom, have called Congress together to provide against the contingency. So that I was not so much of a fool when I would the predictions. So that I was not so much of a fool when I made the prediction as the gentleman seems to have thought me.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, as soon as it will be in order for me to do so, I propose to offer the amendment which I send to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following section:
SEC. 3. That the silver coins of the United States of the denomination of $1 shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $50 in any one payment; and silver coins of the United States of the denominations of less than $1 shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $25 in any one payment.

Mr. REAGAN. I have had the impression that it was the wish of the American people as soon as they could to resume specie payment, and, if not, to make gold and silver the currency of the country, to and, if not, to make gold and silver the currency of the country, to make the currency of the country equivalent to gold and silver. Gold and silver are the constitutional currency in this country. In the judgment of some, other things are lawful currency; but as to these there is no question that they are the lawful and constitutional currency of the country. We need both. When we see that the aggregates of the interest to be paid on the bonds of the Federal Government held abroad, the interest which has to be paid on State bonds, and the interest which has to be paid on railroad and other corporate bonds are taking out of this country not less than two hundred will. bonds are taking out of this country not less than two hundred millions of specie annually, I have not been able to understand why our legislation should demonetize a part of the constitutional currency of this country and place it that much further out of our power to reach a constitutional currency.

Nature has placed within our reach and within our possession vast amounts of silver as well as gold. We have been in the habit of regarding it as one of our national blessings that we have it. We are, perhaps, the largest silver-producing country in the world. Is it to our interest to demonstize that which is known to the commerce of the world as money, and is recognized by our Constitution as money, which we have in large abundance and need daily in the ordinary business of life, as well as for the uses of the Government? I do not know, sir, that the amendment which I propose to offer to this bill will do all that I desire to see done in making silver a practical and useful part of the currency of this country. But it does seem to me a step in the right direction to the extent to which it goes.

I confess, sir, as I claim no special wisdom on the subject of currency, that I have been almost confused by the remarks of the learned and distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. Hewitt] and the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Kelley,] who have just addressed the committee. They seemed to object to silver: First, because it was not valuable; not so valuable as currency; and then they object to it because it is so valuable that currency will take its place and it will have the country. And now patiently and correctly as and it will leave the country. And now, patiently and earnestly as this committee has listened to the remarks of those two gentlemen, I ask if there is any gentleman in the House who can tell whether their objection was most to the fact that silver would be too valuable or most to the fact that it would not be valuable enough? It seems to me that there was an objection to silver in any form or for any purposes of money on the part of both of them.

One of the gentlemen said that Germany from her necessities had been compelled to change her policy of demonetizing silver, and to make it again a part of the currency of that empire. The other said, speaking however before him, that in consequence of the recognition of this value given to silver by making it money in Germany, it had increased one cent an ounce in its value, and would leave this country and go to foreign countries.

Mr. Chairman, if we have silver coin which will stand at or nearly at par all the time, if we make the silver dollar a legal tender for any sums in any one payment of $50, we give it by our law a money value with the people that it does not have now. If we make the smaller with the people that it does not have now. If we make the smaller silver coins a legal tender in any one payment for $25, we give it a money value that it has not now. By the law as it stands to-day silver is only a legal tender for $5 in any one payment. I would have been disposed to make it a legal tender for a larger amount than is proposed in that amendment; but I submit it as it is for the purpose of seeing if it draws a friendly expression from this House.

In relation to driving silver out of the country by the increase of its price, I have only this to say: I have referred to the fact that to pay the interest on United States bonds and the interest on State and railroad and other bonds, we must send out of the country not less than $200,000,000,000 of gold abroad annually.

If the policy of the governments of the Old World has increased the value of silver, then it aids us to utilize our silver. For every million of silver that they take out they leave a million of dollars in gold ion of silver that they take out they leave a million of dollars in gold here that would have gone in its stead, and that silver would help to pay this interest or to meet the balances of exchange in trade. If that be true, then it furnishes a coin currency at once that may be that be true, then it furnishes a coin currency at once that may be utilized in contributing to the amount of specie and in meeting the business necessity of this country and of other countries.

Now, sir, when we look to the fact that there is a yield of very many millions of silver annually, that it is the constitutional currency of the country, that the people would be glad to possess it and would be benefited by that possession, I desire to know if it is right to go forward in the policy of demonetizing the constitutional currency of the country, and substituting in its place a paper currency which many people do not think equal to a metallic currency. What is the advantage of issuing a deregoided paper currency instead of which many people do not think equal to a metallic currency. What is the advantage of issuing a depreciated paper currency instead of giving a money value to coin, the constitutional currency of this country? I confess, sir, that I feel scarcely able to comprehend the line of suggestion and argument made by the two gentlemen who have preceded me and who have studied this subject more than I have done, and may be greatly wiser upon it than I am. But I am not able to comprehend—it may be my fault, not theirs—why we should reject a metallic currency, which is the constitutional currency of the country, and demonetize it for the purpose of issuing a depreciated paper currency. I do not understand that. We may adopt a theory by which we may get along with paper and without a metallic currency, but there does underlie this in the judgment of the entire country the idea that the currency of the Constitution is a metallic currency, and is better than its representative, a paper currency.

currency, and is better than its representative, a paper currency.

I know and recognize the fact that for the purpose of commerce we cannot expect all the offices of money to be performed by metal, but while we cannot make a coin or metallic currency answer conveniently while we cannot make a coin or metallic currency answer conveniently all the uses of commerce, still to strike down the value of our metallic currency, to demonetize it, to make, in the language of a number of gentlemen on this floor, a commodity of it by changing it for paper and that paper redeemable—how? By re-exchanging it for other paper. Is it supposed that this will give us a currency that will have the confidence of the American people, that will bring stability to our business transactions and will secure soundness in trade, uniformity in the prices of labor and weaponts the present of this contraction. in the prices of labor, and promote the prosperity of this country, and at the same time keep prices without fluctuation either in money, labor, or commerce? If it will not it seems to me a fallacy. Ido not propose to go further into this question than simply to suggest that silver is the constitutional currency, that we have it in abundance, that the policy to demonetize it discriminates unjustly against the interests of our own people and in favor of the bondholders in Europe who hold our national bonds, our State bonds, and our railroad bonds.

I trust the amendment I have offered or something like it will be adopted. I would go further myself, but I trust that something will be done that will recognize the money value of silver, thus utilizing the products of our mines and giving us a currency better than a de-preciated paper currency, relieving to that extent the financial con-dition of the country and to that extent taking one step toward the resumption of specie payments.

One word more before I take my seat. I am not sure that the second section of the bill is to prove effective in preserving to us a fractional currency. It may be that silver coin, being more valuable than the fractional paper currency, may sink into the bank vaults of the country and leave us without any fractional currency. But I do not propose to go into that question now. I merely propose, in connection with the part of the bill which relates to the coinage of silver, to increase the value of one part of the constitutional currency of the country, and utilize our accumulating millions of silver for the relief of our financial embarrassments.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee do now rise.
Mr. HOLMAN. Before the committee rises, I desire to submit an amendment to the bill to add the words which I send to the Clerk's desk; and I will ask that they be read:

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

The owners of silver bullion may deposit the same in any mint of the United States to be formed into coin of the denomination aforesaid; it shall be lawful, however, to refuse any deposits of less value than $100. The charge for converting standard silver into such coin shall be fixed from time to time by the Director of the Mint with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, so as to equal the actual charges and cost at each mint of the material, wastage, and use of machinery in such coinage: Provided, however. That such silver coinage shall not, together with the silver coin of the denomination as aforesaid and the silver bullion now owned by the United States, exceed in par value the par value of the fractional currency now authorized by law, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall not be authorized to further increase the interest-bearing debt of the United States by the issue and sale of bonds for the purchase of silver bullion for coinage.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. OLIVER] desires to give notice in the same way of another amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. I give notice that at the proper time I will move the amendment I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 3586 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed and the following enacted in lieu thereof, to wit:

SEC. 3586. The trade dollar shall be a legal tender only to the amount of $1 in any one payment, and the fractional silver coinage shall be a legal tender only for an amount less than $1 in any one payment.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to give notice that at the proper time I will move to amend the pending bill by striking out the second sec-

Mr. PAGE. I give notice that at the proper time I will move the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "redemption" in the seventh line the following:
And the Secretary of the Treasury shall continue such redemption of fractional currency by causing, under proper regulations, the coinage of not less than $1,000,000 each month, and issuing the same until all the outstanding fractional currency be redeemed.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I give notice that at the proper time will move the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk. The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 2 the following:
That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to have all silver bullion on hand at the present time coined into silver coins of the denominations of ten, twenty-five, and fifty cent pieces of standard value, and pay the same out, together with that already coined and in the Treasury, for any debts or demands against the United States in any way that he may prescribe.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. I give notice that at the proper time I will move the amendment I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk began the reading of the I roposed amendment as follows: That so much of section 3 of the act entitled-in order.

Mr. PAGE. Let it be read. How can we tell what it is if we do not hear it read?

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Does the Chair rule the amendment out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so rules.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be read, if there be no objection. There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That so much of section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, as requires the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem legal-tender notes to the amount of 80 per cent. of the sum of national-bank notes issued to any banking association increasing its capital or circulation, or to any association newly organized, as provided in said section, and also so much of said section 3 as relates to or provides for the redemption in coin of the United States legal-tender notes on and after January 1, 1879, and all other provisions of law inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read for the information of the committee the rule upon this subject:

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment. And no bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair is clearly right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the proposed amendment is not in order

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAYLER reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department and for the issue of silver coin of the United States instead of fractional currency, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1962) to confirm certain school-indemnity selections of public lands by the State of Nebraska.

CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced the following members as the conferees on the part of the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1251) to exclude the State of Missouri from the provisions of the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872: Mr. Turney, Mr. Bland, and Mr. Phillips, of Kansas.

VENTILATION OF THE HALL

Mr. YOUNG. I am instructed by the subcommittee of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds upon the ventilation of the Hall of the House of Representatives to report the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the subcommittee charged by resolution of this House with the duty of devising and reporting the measures necessary to be adopted in order to seeme a proper and healthful ventilation of the Hall of the House of Representatives have caused a thorough examination by architects, engineers, and other experts to be made of the present means and appliances for ventilation, and have also caused the atmosphere with which the Hall is now filled, and which members and others are compelled to breathe, to be analyzed by competent chemists and medical professors; and whereas all of said persons have made reports to said committee agreeing unantmously in the opinion that until certain improvements and alterations are made in the present system of ventilation it is improvements and alterations are made in the present system of ventilation it is improvements and alterations are made in tha larger number, including the galleries and members on the floor, will be dangerous to the health, and even to the life, of those who breathe the impure and poisonous atmosphere that would thereby be created: Therefore,

Be it resolved. That the Doockeeper of the House be, and he is hereby, directed that from and after the passage of this resolution he will not allow persons to enter the galleries, except those having the privilege of the reporters' and diplomatic galleries and such as under the rules of the House enter on the cards of members, until the further order of the House.

Mr. YOUNG. This is one of the temporary expedients that the

Mr. YOUNG. This is one of the temporary expedients that the committee have deemed it necessary to resort to in order to relieve the Hall from the dangerous atmosphere we are breathing. It is with very great reluctance that the committee make any recommendation for excluding any person from the Hall or the galleries of the House of Representatives. But we found it was absolutely necessary from the testimony of medical experts, and we have ventured to submit this resolution to the House and ask to have it adopted. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON.] Mr. HARRISON. The committee have had before them Surgeon-General Barnes and several other officers and chemists, several architects, and the different engineers of this House and of the Senate. We have found some very extraordinary facts in connection with the ventilation of this Hall. The pumping apparatus, or fan, which is supposed to drive fresh air into this room purports to have a capacity for sending in here fifty thousand cubic feet of pure air per minute. By actual test, with the present condition of the flues, we find that only fifteen thousand cubic feet can and is at any time pressed in here—oftener not more than ten thousand feet. Surgeon-General Barnes and the chemist with whom he supplied us, a high officer in the Army, report to us that it is absolutely essential for the safety of members and of people in the galleries that, when the galleries are ordinarily filled, there should be at least one hundred thousand cubic feet of fresh air per minute coming into this room; that much is necessary for absolute safety. But for the purpose of health we ought to have from one hundred and fifty thousand to two hundred thousand cubic feet of fresh air per minute; whereas we are getting only fifteen thousand, often not over ten thousand.

It is utterly impossible to remedy this for some little time to come. Our present supply of air is wholly deficient. Deprived of that amount of oxygen necessary for our health, our systems are daily more or less enervated; and the draughts coming in from the open doors, combined with the poisonous atmosphere, are subjecting all of us constantly to the danger of pneumonia and typhoid fever. Men in this stantly to the danger or pneumonia and typhoid lever. Men in this Hall are imbibing the seeds of disease every day that they come here. We feel, too, that we are inviting the public here to a place that is dangerous to their health. The gallery behind me is occupied from day to day by our friends who come here to witness our deliberations. We see there day after day, week after week, the same persons, watching intently our proceedings. We are destroying their health, when we ought to try to protect them. [Laughter.]

We find that it is utterly impossible to bring about immediately an adequate remedy. We propose this with reluctance as a temporary measure. It is proposed in accordance with the recommendations of the gentlemen whom we have consulted, and whose reports in writing will in a day or two be presented and printed for the information of the House. In submitting this report we are offering not simply our own views, but the views of those who are experts in these matters, and who tell us that under existing arrangements we cannot get into this House air enough for the safety of members themselves. while sitting here day after day legislating for the people, should we be compelled to poison ourselves because idlers—I am sorry to say that a large proportion of them are idlers—force themselves into the galleries? We cannot make discriminations. We therefore propose that the galleries shall be closed to all except the privileged classes and such as, being here from a distance, may get admission upon the criders of members. the orders of members.

Admission to the diplomatic gallery is regulated by the rules. with the reporters' gallery. Into the members' gallery, members under the rules can introduce their friends or strangers. But as to the gen-eral mass of people who come here, we propose that they shall be admitted only on cards from members. We propose this with reluctance; but we do it for the absolute safety of members and of the public.

Mr. CONGER. I hope that this resolution will not be pressed to-ight. One of the very remarks which one of the gentlemen of the committee has been perhaps compelled to make here as a reason for the adoption of the resolution will not sound well in the ears of our constituents. I greatly regret that even for our own personal convenience it should be proposed for the first time in the history of this nation to close the galleries of the Hall of the House of Representatives to all but "privileged classes."

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman allow me to make a single suggestion? Under the rules of the House certain persons have the right of admission to our galleries; and this resolution does not interfere with that. We have decided it to be best to adopt this measure for a few days until we can devise some remedy of a more permanent character

Mr. CONGER. I would seek some other remedy than a resolution of this House making a distinction among the American people—allowing only "privileged classes" to come here and witness the deliberations of the national Congress. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman allow me to explain? The distinctions of which the gentleman speaks do not originate with us; the rules of the House give certain persons the privilege of the gal-leries. We have not undertaken to interfere with that matter.

Mr. CONGER. Ah! but, Mr. Speaker, we are responsible for the rules; we are responsible for sending out to the American people from this democratic House, whose members profess to be the peculiar advocates of universal rights, this first message from our Halls that under our rules or outside of our rules, by resolution or without resolution—I care not from what source the authority comes—we draw a line between classes of the American people in regard to their right to attend the deliberations of the common servants of the common

I have nothing more to say except to hope that this resolution may it sounds throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Mr. HARRISON. I fear, sir, that in the hurry of debate I used a word or phrase which I did not intend. The resolution speaks of persons privileged. In alluding to that I used the words "privileged classes," referring simply to the persons to whom the rules of this House give the privilege of the floor or of the galleries. The use of the phrase "privileged classes" was a slip of the tongue. The privilege of the reporters' gallery and the privilege of the diplomatic gallery are regulated by the rules; we do not undertake to interfere with that matter. So in regard to admission to the floor Separators exthat matter. So in regard to admission to the floor, Senators, exmembers, governors of States, &c., are privileged. This is all I meant. When I referred to "classes," I should simply have said "persons," which is the language of the resolution.

So far as regards the question of democracy, I knew that that fling would come from the other side of the House; and before this report was made I consulted some of the leading members on that side. They cared more for their lives than for the clap-trap that might be sent abroad in connection with this resolution. We came not here to discuss politics. There are gentlemen belonging to the republican side of this House who are now lying at the point of death. There are gentlemen belonging to the democratic side of the House who are to-day suffering from the poisonous atmosphers of this Hall. One of to-day suffering from the poisonous atmosphere of this Hall. One of them has been during the night snatched as it were from the jaws of death, after having been given up by his physicians and making his will. He has rallied, and in all likelihood will recover. Are we then to have it thrown into our faces here that we are talking politics when we are trying to save the men who give up their time to the Govern-we are trying to save the men who give up their time to the Government and come here to attend to the affairs of the people?

A MEMBER. At $5,000 a year. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. Men, sir, who have wives and children to support; and shall we murder them simply because gentlemen try to alarm us by talking about "privileged classes;" about persons privileged under the rules? We come here, democrats and republicans, to do our duty. The republicans on our committee are for this. More of them discussed it than democrats. We have approached more republicans than we have democrats. We never dreamed that any one would give it a political turn. We thought perhaps some one might attempt to do it, but we did not think a gentleman so able as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] would throw any such this restriction of the way was an of the second state. thing into our face. We mean in this resolution nothing of the sort. We do not want you republicans on the other side killed off in this way. We will beat you at the elections, and not get rid of you by way. We will beat you at the elections, and not get rid of you by pneumonia. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I was well aware, nobody could be more aware of the fact than I am, that every thoughtful, reflecting gentleman upon that side of the House would have expected a resolution that struck at the equality of citizenship in the United State s would be opposed by gentlemen on this side. The natural instincts of gentlemen would have expected some one here would oppose a resolution which made a privileged class in the year. Hell of the resolution which made a privileged class in the very Hall of the House of Representatives of the American people. It happened to fall to my humble lot to make that opposition to-day here, when others might have done it much more successfully, I admit; but that it should come from our side is as natural as it is for us to breathe the air of freedom, and to believe and to labor to make universal the idea of the absolute equality of American citizenship.

And the gentleman did the republican side of this House no more than exact justice by asserting we would oppose a resolution which did recognize any class distinction at all. But has it come to this, sir, that under the resolution of the House appointing this committee, after the strange revelations made here in the discussion a day or two since in regard to the impurities of the basement and of the air and of the things which gather around us, there can be no other remedy or the things which gather around us, there can be no other remedy here than to clear the galleries. Is there a lack of air on God's earth that this House cannot reach it? Are all mechanical appliances a failure? Are we shut in here with no possibility of having God's pure air either pumped in, or coaxed in, or brought in by resolution under the previous question, [laughter,] or under a suspension of the rules, or in any other way? [Renewed laughter.] Why do not gentlemen bring air in here—they have a large majority on that side?

[Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The wind is all over there. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I know it is said there are among the republicans of the country some ignorant people. I am sorry to say it. It is said the earthquakes which spread through the country follow the natural consequence of the success of the democrats in getting control of this House. [Laughter.] I never thought so. It may be said the impurities of air Congress has suffered under for years and years, ever since this Hall was made, are worse this year than others. Who pretends to say it? [Laughter.] I only ask the gentlemen who have charge of the subject to exercise the powers which this House has given them in ample measure to open passages to let the air again into this room, and take other means than make class distinction in this country; to take other means than driving away citizens who come a thousand miles to witness our deliberations, [laughter;] driving them away from our galleries unless they can find some member of Congress, following society life, to give them a card with his name on it; and, to show they are personally present, have the right upper corner turned down. [Laughter.]

I have but one or two words more to say on this. I have before me

I have but one or two words more to say on this. I have before me the living example of a man who has endured this air and this atmosphere for twelve or fourteen years, the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Randall,] chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and I submit to all who have been acquainted with him whether he has not added vigor year by year, gained health and strength, and as far as this side of the House is concerned gained additional power to lash us day by day and he has done it without sufstrength, and as far as this side of the House is concerned gained additional power to lash us day by day, and he has done it without suffering. There is my friend from Indiana, [Mr. Holman,] always delicate, [laughter,] always slender, and yet I have never seen the influence of this atmosphere prevent his rising up and giving that peculiarly classic motion of his hand to every objection which he would make, hour by hour and minute by minute, in this House. [Laughter.] Notwithstanding the evils of the atmosphere in this Hall, we may be thankful he is able still to stand up and watch against unreasonable appropriations of the people's money, [laughter;] and I had almost said, except they apply to his own region of country, reasonable ones also.

Here is the trouble about this: Old members in this Hall who can live through one Congress in it are fire-proof; I was about to say for-ever, but I ought not to extend my remarks perhaps beyond the period of our existence in this limited sphere. It is those who come from outdoor life, from breathing the pure air continually in all the avocations of life, and that come here and pursue sedentary lives here, breathing pure air only when they are passing from the seclusion of their rooms to the worse seclusion of this Hall, that suffer most; and it would be the same if they passed from their outdoor vocations in life to any office where they would pursue sedentary lives.

The air here is bad enough, subjecting the members continually to cold and sickness and all the changes which a sedentary life and bad air may bring upon them; but in my humble judgment the remedy lies beyond anything that is suggested here. The remedy lies in an entirely different arrangement of the structure of this Hall. Who else would put a box within a box, so that if any air could reach the inner chamber it must pass by a winding and obstructed way into the House? Who else would have the air which we breathe come in through long, rusty iron pipes into this Hall, and that in insufficient quantities? Why, sir, if this Hall could be extended to one side with no partition between us and the windows through which the light of heaven and the air of heaven may come, there would be better air, heaven and the air of heaven may come, there would be better air, there would be more cheerfulness, there would be less ill-temper, there would be less wrangling, and we would pursue our business here in the House with better health and better feeling, more to our own satisfaction and more to the satisfaction of the country. Why, sir, the air of this House is worse than dyspepsia; the atmosphere we breathe is worse than the overflow of bile. It is no marvel to me that we have periodically every two or three days a time when members must give vent to their imprisoned feelings and passions or die; and I have thought sometimes it would be better they should die; it would be more graceful, it would be more dignified. [Laughter.]

Now, let that committee, Mr. Speaker, instead of proposing this would be more graceful, it would be more dignified. [Langhter.]

Now, let that committee, Mr. Speaker, instead of proposing this resolution or using the phrase which I understand is not in the resolution, which my friend inadvertently did use—let that committee pursue the project of finding out how the pure air, and I wish I might add the free light of heaven, an come unobstructed into our Hall; and I venture to say that when that is done there will be better legislation here; there will be better health among the members; there will be less leaves of absence for sickness, and our ears will not be pained with continual notices that our brethers are despendent. e pained with continual notices that our brethren are taken from this floor to sick beds; and there will be less occasion for the memorial this floor to sick beds; and there will be less occasion for the memorial services which have become so strangely frequent in these later years.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think, Mr. Speaker, this is too serious a matter to make light of. My friend from Michigan [Mr. Conger] admits that the air is impure. He admits that it is the cause of much ill-health and ill-temper here. He admits that the Hall needs reconstruction, and that almost everything imaginable is wrong with it at present. Now, sir, I had hoped that the suggestions made by this committee would have met with some encouragement, and I am a little sorry that my friend from Michigan caught at this expression. little sorry that my friend from Michigan caught at this expression, class," occurring in the report, in order to turn the report itself into ridicule.

Some members are absent occasionally on business, some on pleasure, and many on account of illness; some leave in the middle of the session, some are only present when they are interested in the pro-

I can say, Mr. Speaker, what I think very few members of this House can say, that I have never been absent from a sitting of this House, that I have never been absent from a vote of this House, that I have never been absent from any business of this House since I was first a member of it. I came here with a constitution that I did not believe could be shaken by anything; but I find here an atmosphere worse than that of the cattle-yards in Iowa, worse than that of any emigrant-ship that ever crossed the Atlantic, and I find that I cannot stand it and stay in the House as regularly as I have previously. For the first time since I have been a member of the House I am compelled to go out every day while some friend is making a long speech, and I am blessing him while out, for the first time I ever prayed for long-winded friends, for making the long speech, so that I can get fresh air.

If we are to do business in this box without any improvement in the system of ventilation, gentlemen must divide themselves into relief parties who will sit here and inhale death in turn and alternately go out for fresh air. I have entertained the thought that where such important business is being transacted each member is responsible for what is done and should give it his personal attention. The commitimportant business is being transacted each member is responsible for what is done and should give it his personal attention. The committee tell us we need ten times the amount of fresh air the capacity of our fans will furnish, to provide oxygen for the large audiences that are here daily, and on the authority of such experts as the Surgeon-General. Is it asking too much of the people to invite them to refrain from poisoning themselves and us for just a few days?

Now, if the suggestion of the committee is obnoxious to my friend from Michigan, why not shut up all the galleries, by unanimous consent, for a day or two at least, while changes can be made in the construction of this building? It is in our power by unanimous consent to change our rules in that respect for a short time. If the idea in to change our rules in that respect for a short time. If the idea in the mind of the gentleman from Michigan is this, that we are likely to shut out our colored brethren in the galleries, one thousand of whom desire to visit us daily, I will promise for one to bring one of them every day and put him in my own seat while the committee is making the experiment. I have no idea of that kind. I do not wish to prolong anything in the shape of class distinctions. I once sat here gradually killing ourselves by breathing the atmosphere in this Hall, and something ought to be done to improve it.

Mr. HARRISON. Gentlemen have been asking us why we don't do this and something ought do the This reaching the strength of the transfer of do this and why we don't do that. This resolution proposes to close the galleries for, we hope, only a very few days. We are preparing a report, which we hope will be adopted by the House, which will again open the galleries. This will be only for a few days.

That portion of the resolution, I will say to my friend from Michieur, and the same of the resolution.

igan, was suggested by my friend from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] as one of the things necessary under the rules of the House. It was suggested by the physicians who were before us to limit the attendance to three hundred. The gentleman from Iowa thought that would be the best, so as to cover those who had the privileges of the floor. Mr. YOUNG. I now call the previous question.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Will my colleague [Mr. HARRISON] allow me to call his attention to the latter part of the resolution? It speaks of allowing persons to have the privileges of the galleries who are entitled to enter under the rules on the cards of members. Now I know that there is nothing in the rules, unless an amendment has been adopted very recently, in regard to the admission of any person been adopted very recently, in regard to the admission of any person on the cards of members, and I have not known previous to this Congress cards sent in to members to be signed by them. I know the practice has prevailed, but there is nothing in the rules that authorizes it, and that part of the resolution would exclude everybody who did not procure a card signed by a member, and it seems to me that would impose a great burden upon members.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to suggest that a motion be made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG,] who made this report, to recommit it for the purpose of having the matter more carefully considered. Let us examine into the matter carefully and perhaps we sidered. Let us examine into the matter carefully and perhaps we may agree to take action in the direction he proposes.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to recall to the recollection of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] what several gentlemen who have had some years of service here will remember. It was a favorite motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Washburne]—he offered it at several sessions—that immediately after the adjournment of the House the doors on this floor and above in the galleries, and all the windows opposite to these doors, should be opened and kept open a considerable number of hours. Now, everybody will observe that no sooner do we leave this Hall than every door is closed up and all this bad air remains in the Hall until morning. As an old member, I can say that I have never known the atmosphere of this Hall so bad as it has been this winter. But if at the adjournment of this House the Doorkeeper would leave every door on this floor and in the galleries open, and the connecting windows open, I believe it would make a very great difference in the atmosphere of the Hall.

Mr. ATKINS. That is done now.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] by request of the Doorkeeper, that it is his uniform habit every day as soon as the House adjourns to open all the doors and leave them open until half past eight or nine o'clock. The Door-keeper desires that this statement should be made.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. FOSTER. The Doorkeeper is certainly in error as to the time he leaves the doors and windows open. I have had occasion to come here on several evenings, and I always find them closed up a little past seven o'clock.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know what the truth may be, but certainly all gentlemen who have served in this House for many years (and I am one of that number) will testify I think and agree that from some cause or other there never was such a bad air in this Hall as there has been this winter. I think that is the universal testimony.

Mr. YOUNG. I propose in a moment to move to recommit the resolution to the committee. Before I do so, however, in justice to my self as chairman of the subcommittee and gentlemen who have served with me, I wish to make a very brief explanation.

I do not agree, sir, with my colleague on the committee from Illinois, [Mr. Harrison,] that we expected any opposition from the opnois, [Mr. Harrison,] that we expected any opposition from the opposite side of the House. I certainly expected nothing of that sort. I thought that this was a measure which every gentleman on this floor of every party would readily agree to if they could be convinced as to the necessity or propriety of such a measure, and so far from expecting that gentlemen on the other side of the House would make opposition, remembering the traditions of my own party, I should have concluded that the opposition, if any, would come from this side of the House. I remember that we have been called for years past the "great unwashed democracy," and if any opposition was to be made to exclude the sovereigns from the galleries of the House—the people who wish to come here and witness our legislation—I should have expected that the opposition would have come from my own side

Mr. FOSTER. The motion to recommit has been made upon your side of the House.

Mr. YOUNG. I have not yet made the motion; but, sir, I now disclaim in my own name and in that of all the committee any partisan object whatever in the introduction of this resolution. It is one indicated as they thought by the necessities of the occasion. We have several republican members on this committee, and those gentlemen acted with us in entire accord. I have also consulted on the subject gentlemen on the other side of the House who are not members of the committee, and with one distinguished leader of the House on that side, and it was at his suggestion that we excluded from the galleries everybody excepting those who were privileged.

The resolution as originally drawn up by myself provided for the admission of a limited number of persons. At the suggestion of the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Kasson,] that was changed so as to leave admissions to be made as they are now made to the floor by the Speaker or members.

I now move to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I would like to have the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Congen] appointed on that committee, so as to let him investigate these matters for himself.

Mr. HOAR. Before the gentleman concludes I would like to say one word. The committee will find no opposition, I think, from the republican side of the House, if they find that on reflection this is the best proposition to be made. I am quite sure that there will be no attempt to make political or partisan capital on this side of the House

As I am up I desire to say that I came to this House eight years ago, the youngest member of my delegation. I am now the senior in continuous service, and within that brief period seven members of that delegation have died, and that is a fact which impresses me with great seriousness.

The motion to recommit was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. Was the motion on which we just voted to recommit ?

The SPEAKER. It was.
Mr. RANDALL. Why not pass the resolution?
Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the resolution will be recommitted.
Mr. HARRISON. There is no sense in recommitting it.

Mr. WHITE. The committee have already reported it. Whossible use can there be in recommitting it?

The SPEAKER. The resolution has already been recommitted.

Mr. WHITE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was recommitted.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let the motion to reconsider be entered upon the Journal and be pending.

Mr. MacDOUGALL. I move that the House now adjourn.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Pending the motion to adjourn, Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, asked unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time the following preamble and resolution:

consideration at this time the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for 1873 shows conclusively that the District of Columbia since 1863 paid, exclusive of the income tax, into the United States Treasury the sum of $4,695,190,94, or more than all the other Territories combined, and more than the following seven States, each having two representatives upon the floor of the United States Senate, namely: Arkansas, Wisconsin, Florida, Kansas, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, and Oregon; and whereas it is un-American and undemocratic to deprive any large community of Americans of the sacred right of the ballot and of the right to select their servants by universal suffrage: Therefore, in consideration of these premises,

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, ordered to report back to the House as soon as possible the bill now before them restoring an elective government and a Delegate in Congress to the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. That resolution ought not to be adopted at this time. Let it be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Very well; let it be referred.

There was no objection, and the preamble and resolution were accordingly referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PACKER asked and obtained leave of absence until Monday

Mr. Purman was granted leave of absence until the 23d instant.

The motion of Mr. MacDougall was then agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. GOODIN: The petition of Byron Judd and others, of Wyandott, Kansas, that legal-tender notes be made receivable for all dues, public and private, and for the issue of 3.65 interconvertible bonds, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.
By Mr. HENDERSON: The petition of James D. Camp and 232 others, citizens of Lee County, Illinois, that the present rate of duty on linseed, linseed-oil, and jute may be maintained, to the Committee of Ways and Manne.

of Ways and Means.

By Mr. LANE: Resolutions adopted at a public meeting at Portland, Oregon, March 13, 1876, relative to the Northern Pacific Railroad, to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

By Mr. NORTON: Remonstrance of the Seneca Indians of New York against the passage of the bill accompanying Executive Document No. 106, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of Martha J. Coston, for compensation for the manufacture by her of the Coston signal-lights for the Navy, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, memorial of the Vessel-Owners' and Captains' Association of Philadelphia, favoring the repeal of compulsory pilotage on coastwise vessels, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, resolutions of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, recommending the repeal of compulsory pilotage on coastwise vessels, to the same committee.

By Mr. PIERCE: The petition of officers and mariners at the port of Boston, that the shipping act of 1872 may be continued in force with such proper amendments as will more fully protect them, to the same committee.

By Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania: The petition of Michael Farrell, Henry Steiger, Edward Shields, and Mary Willis, sufferers by the ex-plosion at Frankfort Arsenal, August 7, 1875, for relief, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SPRINGER: The petition of Eli H. Hosea, acting regimental adjutant of the Tenth Illinois Cavalry, for pay for services rendered prior to being mustered into the service, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. STRAIT: A joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, requesting that settlers on the lands along the line of the Brainard and Saint Vincent branches of the Saint Paul and Pacific Railway be allowed to complete their title to the same.

Also, a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, that the Indian Department be required to keep the various bands of Chippewa Indians on their reservation.

Also, a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, requesting the establishment of a post-route from Brown's Valley to North Island Settlement, on Lake Travers, and from Brown's Valley to Ortonville, on Big Stone Lake, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads

Also, a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, asking that pensions be granted the officers and privates of the Minnesota State militia who were disabled in the Indian massacre of 1862, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SWANN: Remonstrance of J. Knox & Co., W. H. McMichael & Sons, Thomas D. Loney & Co., and 75 other merchants, bankers, and business men of Baltimore, Maryland, against the abolition of the United States subtreasury in that place, and asking an appropriation for the purpose of continuing it there, to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, a resolution of the Corn and Flour Exchange of Baltimore, Maryland, signed by Charles D. Fisher, president, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. THOMAS: The petition of citizens of Maryland, for an appropriation of $30,000 for the removal of obstructions in the navigation of the Great Choptank River, between Denton and Greensborough, Maryland, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: The petition of Mrs. Susan Willard, for compensation for supplies furnished to and rent for building used as a hospital by the United States Army, to the Committee on War

Claims

By Mr. WILLARD: The petition of Mrs. Louisa Freeman and other citizens of Barry County, Michigan, that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place the name of Louisa Freeman on the pension-roll, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware: The petition of N. H. Coverdale, for relief from penalty of failure to fulfill a contract with the Navy Department occasioned by Government seizure of his vessels, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin: The petition of Peter Meagher, for relief, to the same committee.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 17, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PITTSBURGH CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. HOPKINS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to House resolution of March 13, and the report of A. K. Tingle and George H. Fox, special agents of the Treasury Department, dated February 21, 1876, relative to illegal charges and irregularities in the Pittsburgh custom-house, be printed for the use of the House.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. KEHR, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 313 a bill (H. R. No. 2689) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Sioux City, and moved that the bill be printed and recommitted.

Mr. HURLBUT. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. It will be so understood.

There was no objection, and the bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty minutes past twelve o'clock. This being Friday, the first business in order during the morning hour is the call of committees for reports of a private nature. The call rests with the Committee on Patents.

COMMITTEE ON CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. BANKS. I would like to move a resolution, which I have not now prepared, for reference to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration, authorizing that committee to sit during the vacation of Congress, if it be necessary. I desire to refer such a resolution to that committee for consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] that it is manifestly proper the committee should sit during the vacation, for reasons which must be obvious to

II. Why not adopt the resolution now !
Mr. BANKS. I have no objection, if the House will consent. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that it will be almost indispensable for the committee to hold sessions during the vacation of Congress. There should be some representative of Congress at the centennial exposition in regard to the convenience of members and the regulation of the course of business so far as they are concerned. I will ask that the consent of the House be given to the committee for that purpose.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. May I ask also that the committee have power to employ a clerk?

Mr. RANDALL. O, no; do not embarrass the proposition in that

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Then let the proposition be referred to the committee

Mr. RANDALL. Do not do that.
Mr. HOLMAN. If the only object is to allow this committee to be in session during the sessions of the House, I suppose there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is to authorize the committee to sit during the vacation of Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is to be attended with no expense, there will be no objection to that.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks will not object to the addition of the proviso that this shall not be attended with any expense to the Government.

Mr. BANKS. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing that such a proviso shall be added.

Mr. RANDALL. Do not let us put in that proviso. Let it be understood without placing it upon the record.

Mr. HOLMAN. If that is unanimously understood, I have no objection. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration be authorized to sit during the recess of Congress. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

RE-IMBURSEMENT TO THE CITY OF BALTIMORE.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2690) to refund to the mayor and city council of Baltimore certain moneys illegally assessed and collected for internal-revenue taxes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

F. M. BLOUNT.

Mr. THOMAS also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it pass, a bill (H. R. No. 915) for the relief of F. M. Blount, of Chicago, Illinois; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JAMES J. WARING.

Mr. THOMAS also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it pass, a bill (H. R. No. 776) for the relief of James J. Waring, of Savannah, Georgia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

EXCHANGE BANK OF PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. WIKE, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back, with an amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 2018) to authorize the Exchange National Bank of Pittsburgh Pennsylvania, to improve Exchange National Bank of Pittsburgh Pennsylvania, to improve certain real estate.

The bill was read. It provides that the Exchange National Bank of Pittsburgh shall have power and authority to hold, improve, and lease a certain lot or piece of ground situate on Fifth avenue and Diamond street, in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, adjoining the property owned and used by the corporation as its banking-house; the lot having been owned by the institution during its existence under a State charter, and since its organization as a national bank.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

Provided, That no funds of the said bank, except its surplus beyond the amounts required to be retained by section 5199 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be applied to said improvement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and

CLAIMS.

Mr. BRIGHT. The Committee of Claims have had under consideration sundry claims arising under the act of July 4, 1864, examined and allowed by the proper accounting officers since December 7, 1874, amounting to $158,548.10, and have directed me to report a bill with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The bill (H. R. No. 2691) for the allowance of claims reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGES OF REFERENCES.

Mr. BRIGHT. The Committee of Claims have examined the bill (H. R. No. 1953) for the relief of Alfred Muller, late acting assistant surgeon in the United States Army, and find it to have been improperly referred. They have therefore directed me to report it back and to move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee of Claims, reported back petitions and bills of the following titles, and moved that the Committee of Claims be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on War Claims; which motion was agreed to:

WILLIAM J. POLLOCK.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, from the Committee of Claims, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 1048) for the relief of William J. Pollock; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be

B. F. WEST & CO.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee of Claims, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 40) to re-imburse B. F. West & Co., of Martin's Ferry, Ohio, for internal-revenue stamps stolen from Cambridge, Ohio, post-office, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HIBBEN & CO., OF CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

Mr. TUCKER. I am directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report back a bill (S. No. 490) for the relief of Hibben & Co., of Chicago, Illinois, with the recommendation that it do pass; and I ask that it be put on its passage at once.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Hibben & Co., of Chicago, Illinois, the sum of $3,912.16, or so much thereof as the said Hibben & Co. shall prove, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that they have expended in the purchase of revenue stamps used by them to stamp manufactured tobacco upon which a tax had been previously paid under the revenue laws in force at the time of its manufacture and sale, but which was made liable to be stamped under the act of and sale, but which was made hable to be stamped under the act of July 20, 1868, thus requiring a double tax on the same tobacco.

Mr. BRADLEY. I would like to hear the gentleman from Virginia explain to the House how these beneficiaries have paid this tax twice?

Mr. TUCKER. I will explain it. Hibben & Co, paid a tax of fifteen cents upon certain manufactured tobacco. The act of 1868 was afterward passed requiring a tax of sixteen cents and a new stamp. These parties did not dispose of the tobacco before that act of 1868 went into operation, and the internal-revenue officers required the payment of this new tax of sixteen cents before the sale of the topayment of this new tax of sixteen cents before the sale of the to-bacco. They had paid fifteen cents under the previous law and then sixteen cents under the law of 1868, and the proposition now before the House is that they shall have refunded to them the sixteen cents tax. Mr. BRADLEY. I should like to ask whether the prior tax which

Mr. BRADLEY. I should like to ask whether the prior tax which had been paid was denoted by affixing the stamps to the package? Mr. TUCKER. I do not exactly remember how that was.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. If my colleague on the committee will yield to me I will explain that matter. The prior tax was paid under a law which did not require any stamp. The tobacco was merely to be put up in certain packages. The law of 1868, however, required the affixing of stamps. As has been stated, this tobacco was manufactured before the law of 1868 and paid the tax then imposed. There was a certain time within which tobacco could be put upon There was a certain time within which tobacco could be put upon the market without payment of the new tax, but the evidence before the Committee of Ways and Means shows that the parties in whose favor this bill is proposed to be enacted were unable to dispose of their tobacco in that time. The Committee of Ways and Means of the last House reported unanimously in favor of refunding this tax. bill has passed the Senate unanimously, and has been reported back from the Committee of Ways and Means unanimously.

Mr. TUCKER. I am obliged to the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, for explanation in reference to the details of the law. I believe there was a mode of designating the payment of taxes by stencil-marks prior to the passage of the act of 1868, and by that mode these parties paid the fifteen cents tax. They were not, however, able to dispose of their tobacco before the new law went into operation, and were compelled to pay the new tax of sixteen cents. There can be no question about the justice of this claim. The Committee of Ways and Means examined it carefully, and instructed me to report it back to the House unanimously. We were about to submit a report upon this case when this bill came down from the Senate.

Mr. BRADLEY. The only question in my mind was as to the evidence that the tax had been twice paid. After hearing the statements of gentlemen I feel satisfied in that regard.

Mr. TUCKER. I will say for the satisfaction of the gentleman from Michigan that I am satisfied the tax was paid, but the act itself only requires the refunding of it when the Department shall be satisfied. only requires the refunding of it when the Department shall be satisfied it was twice paid.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly.

read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLLECTORS AND SUPERVISORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. TUCKER. I am instructed by the same committee to report back a bill (H. R. No. 1585) to authorize the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to designate and fix the points at which collectors and supervisors of the revenue shall hold their offices.

The SPEAKER. That is a public law, and cannot be received on private-bill day

Mr. TUCKER. I withdraw the bill for the present.

RELINQUISHMENT OF TITLE BY THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. PIPER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2692) to relinquish the title of the United States to certain property in the city and county of San Francisco, California; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF NAME OF STEAMBOAT CHARLES W. MEAD.

Mr. PIPER also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 726) to change the name of the steamboat Charles W. Mead, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, directs that authority is thereby given to the owner of the steamboat Charles W. Mead, of Allegheny City,

Pennsylvania, to change the name of said vessel to that of General

Meade, by which name said steamboat shall hereafter be known.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PIPER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PATENTS IN MISSION LAND CASES.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 631) providing for the adjudication and issue of patents in mission land cases in the State of Oregon and the Territories of Washington, Idaho, and Montana; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

Mr. LANE also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2382) granting the right of way to the Hot Springs Railroad Company over the Hot Springs reservation in the State of Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHANGING REGISTERS AND NAMES OF VESSELS.

Mr. WARD. I desire to ask the Chair if a bill to change the register of a vessel is regarded as a private bill?

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair it would be a public bill. It pertains to and affects a very important general system.

Mr. WARD. I have another bill which I am directed to report, by Mr. WARD. I have another bill which I am directed to report, by the Committee on Commerce, to change the name of a vessel. I did not regard it as a private bill and did not report it when the Committee on Commerce was on call a few minutes ago. One bill, however, was reported for that purpose by the gentleman from California, [Mr. PIPER,] and, if in order, I desire to report this one.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised what has been the practice hithere is reference to hills of that kinds and partil further of tice hitherto in reference to bills of that kind; and until further advised he would rule that they were public bills.

ROBERT TANSILL.

Mr. KNOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 198) to relieve the disabilities of Robert Tansill, of Virginia, with amendments by the Senate, and the recommenda-tion that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in. The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

In line 2 after the word "the" insert the word "political." Amend the title so as to read "An act to relieve the political disabilities of Rob-ert Tansill, of Virginia."

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

HENRY B. KELLY.

Mr. KNOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back the bill (H. R. No. 2197) for the relief of Henry B. Kelly, of Louisiana, from political disabilities imposed by the four-teenth amendment, with the recommendation that it pass. I will state that there is a petition by the party seeking to be relieved.

The bill was read. It removes from Henry B. Kelly, a citizen of Louisiana, all political disabilities imposed by the four-teen in amendment the Constitution of the United States by reason to amendment to the Constitution of the United States, by reason of participation in the late rebellion.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof.)

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Judiciary were discharged from the further consideration of the following bills; and they were referred to the Committee of Ways

The bill (H. R. No. 853) to repeal certain words and lines of chapter 6, title 35, section 3369, of the Revised Statutes at Large; and The bill (H. R. No. 2172) to regulate and facilitate the payment of duties on imported merchandise.

ASSIGNEES OF WILLIAM T. CHEATHAM.

Mr. HUNTON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back without amendment, and with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 489) for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham, and I ask that the The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham, the sum of $164, in full for moneys wrongfully collected from said William T. Cheatham by the internal-revenue collector for the second district of the State of Kentucky, in 1870, as a tax for keeper of bonded warehouse in December, 1869, and January, 1870.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and it was accordingly

read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

C. M. PURVIANCE AND F. WYETH ..

Mr. EDEN, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with the recommendation that it do pass, with amendments, the bill (S. No. 192) for the relief of Caroline M. Purviance and Francis Wyeth; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF JOHN W. GALL.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 252) for the relief of the legal representatives of John W. Gall, deceased, late of Company A, One hundred and thirtieth Regiment Illinois Volunteers; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL CRARY.

Mr. CABELL, from the same committee, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 927) for the relief of Samuel Crary; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH ANDERSON.

Mr. WARREN, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2693) for the relief of Joseph Anderson, of Nashville, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

W. W. VAN ANTWERP.

Mr. ELLIS, from the same committee, reported back, as a substitute for House bill No. 107, a bill (H. R. No. 2694) for the relief of W. W. Van Antwerp, late of the Fourth Michigan Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALMONT BARNES.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1200) for the relief of Almont Barnes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM A. GRAHAM.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was absent from the House, having been detained in the committee-room by business at the time the Committee Mr. DOUGLAS. on Patents was called. I now ask unanimous consent to report the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk that it may be passed. I will ask that the reading of the report be dispensed with, unless some gentleman calls for it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 431) for the relief of the heirs of William A. Graham.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas it appears that William A. Graham, in the year A. D. 1837, filed his application in due form for letters-patent for a certain invention or discovery of a novel method of or means for extinguishing fires, with apparatus for making the same effective, and died in the year A. D. 1857, without procuring letters-patent therefor: Therefore,

Be it engeted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the heirs of the said William A. Graham, late of the town of Lexington, in the county of Rockbridge and State of Virginia, be, and are hereby, relieved of and from all disabilities now existing and preventing them from renewing or reviving said application by the administrator of the estate of said William A. Graham, deceased; that such administrator be, and is hereby, authorized to renew said application or file a new one; and that the Commissioner of Patents be, and is hereby, anthorized and directed to grant and issue letters-patent for the invention or inventions set forth in such application: Provided, That such alleged inventions shall be found to have been new and useful at the time of filing such application; said patent when issued to have the same force and effect as though no delay had occurred in prosecuting said application or in granting a patent thereon: Provided, however, That all persons or parties having machines containing said inventions, or any part thereof, in use at the time of issuing such patent, shall have the right to continue the use thereof without charge or molestation.

The committee reported the following as an amendment to the bill:

The committee reported the following as an amendment to the bill:

In line 21, after the word "molestation," insert the words "nor shall any one be liable for an infringement of the invention of said Graham prior to the issuing of the letters-patent therefor."

Mr. HURLBUT called for the reading of the report but subsequently withdrew the call.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask that the bill be now engrossed and read a

PAY OF TELEGRAPH OPERATORS IN THE CAPITOL.

Mr. HOSKINS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Accounts, reported back a joint resolution (H. R. No. 70) fixing the pay of the telegraph operators of the House and Senate, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. This is "private-bill day," and the morning hour has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. Has objection been made to our proceeding so that all the committees shall be called for reports of a private na-

The SPEAKER. The Chair has heard no objection, but the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is a question of superior privilege.

Mr. BRIGHT. I cannot yield; this is the day for the consideration Mr. BRIGHT. I canno of the Private Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. There are quite a number of private bills in the hands of committees which, if they could be reported, could be placed on the Calendar and could be considered to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that there are already so many bills to be prepared for reference to the Committee on the Private Calendar that it would be impossible for the clerks to prepare any more for reference to that committee.

The question was taken on Mr. BRIGHT'S motion; and on a division there were—ayes 39, noes 67; no quorum voting.

Mr. BRIGHT. I call for tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will consent to the completion of the call of committees for reports of a private nature, so as to place all on a similar footing.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Bright] insist on a demand for tellers

Mr. BRIGHT. No, sir; I will not insist upon it.
The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman's motion is lost.
Mr. RANDALL. I suggest, then, that we proceed with the call until all the committees shall have been called for private business.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered. The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair,) continued the call of the committees.

BEUBEN WRIGHT.

Mr. SEELYE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1330) for the relief of Reuben Wright; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

S. P. MARSHALL

Mr. BOONE, from the same committee, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 118 a bill (H. R. No. 2695) for the relief of S. P. Marshall, of Sioux County, Iowa; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM T. BRYSON.

Mr. BANNING, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported adversely on the petition of W. T. Bryson; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

THOMPSON B. M'COY.

Mr. BANNING also, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of Thompson B. McCoy, praying to be honorably dis-charged from the military service of the United States; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

JOHN GOWERS.

Mr. BANNING also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1581) for the relief of John Gowers, late of Company C, One hundred and eleventh Regiment New York Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report ordered to be printed.

SALE OF ORDNANCE STORES.

Mr. BANNING also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2012) to authorize the sale of certain ordnance stores to the First Troop of Philadelphia City Cavalry

The bill was read as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell to the First Troop Philadelphia City Cavalry, at the cost price thereof to the United States, one hundred new Springfield carbines, caliber forty-five hundredths, with such acconterments, equipments, and ammunition for the same as may be required; the money received therefor to be passed on the books of the Treasury to the current appropriations for the Ordnance Department of the Army.

Mr. BANNING. I will state that this bill provides that there shall be no loss to the Government in this sale of arms; and the Secretary of War has written a letter, which I now ask to have read, showing that there is no objection to the bill if the money is paid to the Ordnance Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, March 9, 1876.

Washington City, March 9, 1876.

Sie: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of this date, (the inclosure of which was not received.) and to state that I have examined, however, House bill No. 2012, which is referred to therein, being for the sale of certain arms and accounterments to the First City Troop of Philadelphia, and to say that the arms, ammunition, and accounterments are on hand, and there is no objection to their sale, in view of the provision of the bill; that the money received therefor shall pass to the credit of current appropriations for the Ordnance Department.

Very respectfully,

GEO. M. ROBESON. Acting Secretary of War.

Hon, H. B. Banning,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

Mr. RANDALL. I suppose there is no objection to this bill. It follows the practice usual in such cases. It is a bill that I myself introduced, and one in which I feel a great deal of interest. I hope

CHARLES W. MACKEY.

Mr. HURLBUT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with an amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 2482) for the relief of Charles W. Mackey, late first lieutenant Tenth Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Volunteer Corps.

The bill directs the Secretary of War to expunge the record of the dismissal of Charles W. Mackey, first lieutenant Company C, Tenth Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Volunteer Corps, and grant him an honorable discharge from the Army, to date July 11, 1863.

Mr. HURLBUT. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, stating that Charles W. Mackey was improvidently dismissed the service, was never under arrest during all the time when the court-martial proceedings were had, but was actively engaged on duty with his company in actual service until he received notice of his dismissal; that the evidence of the single witness, on which the conviction was had, has been abundantly disapproved by evidence submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs; that the faithfulness and efficiency of Lieutenant Mackey has been completely established, and it is but just to him and to the military service that the recent grainst him should be converted.

the record against him should be corrected.

The amendment reported from the committee was to strike out the word "expunge" and insert the word "correct."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HURLBUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

WASHINGTON LIGHT INFANTRY AND CLINCH RIFLES.

Mr. HURLBUT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 85) to authorize the Secretary of War to issue certain arms to the Washington Light Infantry of Charleston, South Carolina, and the Clinch Rifles of Augusta, Georgia; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution authorizes the Secretary of War to issue to the Washington Light Infantry, of Charleston, South Carolina, and the Clinch Rifles, of Augusta, Georgia, three hundred and twenty improved breech-loading rifles, or such number thereof as shall be necessary to fully arm and equip said organizations, in order that they may participate in and form a part of the centennial legion of the original thirteen States of the Union, which legion has been designated to appear and participate in the international centennial exposition to be held at Philadelphia in 1876; provided that the same can be done in the judgment of the Secretary of War without prejudice to the public service, and also that the commissioned officers of each of said organizations, or a majority of them, shall make, execute, and deliver to the Secretary of War such bond of indemnity for the safe return of the arms, after the close of such exposition, as the Secretary of War shall require

Mr. HURLBUT. I will state for the information of the House that the two military organizations referred to in this joint resolution are a part of what is known as the centennial legion, designated to take part in the celebration of the centennial anniversary of the Independence of the United States at Philadelphia. The States of South Carolina and Georgia are largely indebted to the United States in their supplies of arms, and these arms cannot be obtained from the States. I have some personal feeling in this matter, because some years ago, more than I like to own now, I had the honor of being a member for many years of the first-named organization. I desire that the House will pass this joint resolution, for it will do no injury to the public service, and will enable these two old, well-established, and creditable military organizations to take part in the display which is proposed for our national centennial anniversary.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HURLBUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DANIEL K. SERGEANT.

Mr. GLOVER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back adversely the petition of Daniel K. Sergeant, late second lieutenant Company B, One hundred and thirteenth United States Infantry Colored Volunteers, for additional compensation; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH B. EATON.

Mr. COOK, from the same committee, reported back the petition of Joseph B. Eaton, of Boston, Massachusetts, for payment for supples to the Army of the United States in the Mexican war, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

TIMOTHY MACMAHON.

Mr. TERRY, from the same committee, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 2567) for the relief of Tunothy MacMahon, late a private of Company A, Thirty-fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteers during the war of the rebellion, from the sentence of court-martial, and for other purposes; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

L. M. BLACKMAN.

Mr. STRAIT, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2696) for the relief of L. M. Blackman, late Fourth Tennessee Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have in-Mr. FAULKNER. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have instructed me to report back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, the joint resolution (S. No. 9) authorizing Hon. William L. Scruggs, United States minister at Bogota, to accept a present from the Queen of Great Britain. I ask that the joint resolution be read. The joint resolution was read. It authorizes William L. Scruggs, United States minister at Bogota, to accept a silver inkstand, with a suitable inscription, from the Queen of Great Britain, as a testimonial of her appreciation of his services as a British arbitrator in an important case between British subjects and the government of Colombia.

ant case between British subjects and the government of Colombia.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Foreign Affairs does not recommend the passage of this joint resolution. It regrets to differ so widely as it does in this case from a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature. It differs from the Senate not only as to the general policy of this legislation, but it looks upon this particular case as involving a principle highly objectionable, and as establishing a precedent which ought not to be encouraged.

This species of legislation has grown upon us within the last few years. There have been more of such applications before the present Congress than were before all preceding Congresses in the first sixty years of the history of this Government. If the recent mul-tiplication of these cases afforded evidence of an increase in the performance of praiseworthy deeds demanding national recognition, I should not have so much objection to them as I now have. Indeed, I should, as an American citizen, rejoice to learn that some one of my countrymen had every day in the year performed an act calculated to attract the grateful recognition of foreign governments, and thus shed luster upon their own country. But when we are called upon, as we are now being called upon almost every day, to exercise this del-icate constitutional power in cases which have no extraordinary merit of any kind to recommend them, and which sometimes involve very questionable principles, it is time to pause and reflect a little upon the character and effect of such legislation.

Our plain and republican ancestors had a very different view of the policy of these foreign presents from that which seems to prevail in these days. They looked upon all such gifts by foreign princes to our public officers with extreme disfavor, as tending to open the door to foreign influence; and if not in opposition to the letter of the Constitution, they held the practice, at least, not to be in accordance with the popular tastes and feelings of the country. Sixty-five years of our history elapsed before Congress gave its assent to the acceptance by any public officer of this Government of a present from a foreign prince or state. The earliest instance in our legislation of an effort to procure such consent was in 1798. This case is so remarkable in many of its features and so full of instruction, that I will ask to call the special attention of this House to it.

Thomas Pinckney, of South Carolina, had been accredited as our minister plenipotentiary both to Spain and to Great Britain. Upon leaving those countries he was tendered by the King of Spain and the King of Great Britain certain customary presents. He declined to receive them, upon the ground that the Constitution of his country forbade his acceptance of them without the consent of Congress; but he announced at the time of so declining that he would bring the subject to the attention of Congress and ask its consent to his acceptance of these presents. He accordingly did so by a letter addressed to the Speaker of the House. No case upon its facts could have presented a fairer opportunity to test the opinion of Congress upon the principle and policy involved in these presents. Mr. Pinckney was a distinguished man. He had borne an honorable part in our revolutionary struggle. He had but two years before received the votes of eleven States for the office of President of the United States against John He had signalized his diplomacy abroad by the negotiation of a valuable treaty. He had ceased to be a minister plenipotentiary, and was at that time an influential member of the body to which he addressed his application. And yet after full debate upon the policy of allowing such presents, and amid the highest tributes of personal respect for the character and conduct of the minister, Congress rejected his application. The vote was taken by ayes and noes, and was never reconsidered. A few days afterward Mr. Pinckney himself addressed the House upon the subject, and while he did not seek to reverse the judgment of that body, he expressed the hope that the House would by some resolution indicate the grounds of their decision, so that no implication personally injurious to him should be drawn from their action. This request was acceded to, and a resolution was prepared by one of his friends and unanimously adopted by the House, declaring that "it was induced to such refusal solely by motives of general policy, and not by any view personal to Mr. Pinckney."

The next case was in 1814, when application was made on behalf of General Andrew Jackson to permit him to accept a present of a tract of land tendered to him by the Creek Indians. This also was rejected by Congress. Forty years passed before any further application was reals to Congress to consent to such crifts, when in 1954. made to Congress to consent to such gifts, when, in June, 1854, Matthew F. Maury, a distinguished scientist, and at that time an officer of our Navy, was allowed to accept the present of a gold medal from the King of Sweden for his discoveries in the physical geography of the sea and the currents of the ocean, which had proved so useful to persons of all nations engaged in navigation and commerce.

During this period of sixty-five years from the origin of our Government, the presents tendered to our ministers, consuls, and officers abroad were treated as the property of the Government, not as private donations to the individuals by whom they were received. They were deposited in the Department of State where suitable for such disposition, and where not so suitable, as in the case of the lion and horses presented to the consul of Tangier by the Emperor of Morocco, they were ordered by Congress to be sold at public auction, and the proceeds of sale ordered either to be paid into the public Treasury or applied to some charitable institution in this city. So largely had these presents accumulated in the State Department, and so burden-some had their preservation become, that President Jackson in a special message to Congress in 1834, after announcing that he had given positive instructions that no more of such presents should be received by any of our public officers abroad, without the prior consent of Congress, recommended that the State Department might be disencumbered of all that were then on deposit there, and that they might be distributed to the parties who had originally received them, or their heirs.

This recommendation of President Jackson seems to have revived the idea that these presents from foreign states were hereafter to be treated as the private property of the persons to whom they were given. Accordingly, from 1854 to the present time, many cases have occurred in which Congress has given its consent that such presents might be accepted and retained by the parties as their private propmight be accepted and retained by the parties as their private property. But in looking back to all these cases, except some of recent date, it will be found that they were testimonials accorded either for great and important discoveries in science, philosophy, and the arts, in which the names of Maury, Henry, and Bache shine conspicuously as among the benefactors of our race, or they are accorded for some splendid achievement of heroism and self-sacrifice in the cause of humanity. It was worthy of Great Britain to signalize her appreciation of the arduous and generous sacrifices of those heroic officers who have due to the day are great of the articles are the sacrifice of the search of the braved the storms and the dangers of the arctic seas in search of the lamented Sir John Franklin, and it was befitting an American Congress to respond with favor to such an appeal. So, where the officers of the United States ship Vixen imperiled their lives to save those of British officers and sailors, it was right that the British Queen should acknowledge her gratitude for such heroic service and that Congress should consent to it. But when an Assistant Secretary of the Navy and officers of our Navy visited a European capital, and they were there loaded with presents because of such visit, which presents were permitted to come into the country duty free, or where a lieutenant of the Army under the direct order of the Secretary of War performs the ministerial duty of inspecting military stores purchased by a for-eign prince, it is a perfect farce to dignify gifts for such services by invoking the constitutional power of Congress to exempt them from the general prohibition of the Constitution.

In looking at the more recent of these cases which have been brought before Congress, we are struck with two features which distinguish some of them at least from those of a former period of our history. These are that the acts for which these presents are bestowed are utterly destitute of any rare or extraordinary merit. Again, there is a growing habit of conferring upon our officials those decorations and insignia of foreign orders which are discountenanced by our republican system and belong almost exclusively to the aristocratic institutions of the Old World. Not less than ten of these foreign decorations have with the consent of Congress been conferred upon officers of the United States since the late war, and several are now pending

But, to come to the particular joint resolution which is now before us for concurrence or rejection, what is the act? What is the service which is now sought to be made an exemption from the general constitutional prohibition?

Some British subjects had large pecuniary claims against the Colom-Some British subjects had been subjected by the government. These claims were controverted by that government, and resulted in an arbitration, Mr. Scruggs, our minister resident, being selected by the British claimants as one of the arbitrators. Who was selected by the Colombian government does not appear from the subject of the selected by the Colombian government does not appear from the subject of the sub Who was selected by the Colombian government does not appear from any of the papers. An award was made adjudging a large amount due to these British claimants. This result was of course satisfactory to them, and by consequence to the British government. We have no means of knowing from any of the papers before us how far it was satisfactory to the Colombian government. Possibly it may think very unkindly of the award. The British government now asks our consent to confer upon one of these arbitrators a present for the judicial service rendered in making an award in favor of her subjects. We do not learn that this liberality has been alike extended to the Colombian arbitrator, nor that the present designed for the British arbit. lombian arbitrator, nor that the present designed for the British arbitrator meets with the concurrence of the Colombian government.

Now, sir, what is an arbitrator? He is a judge voluntarily selected by the parties to a controversy. His functions are judicial. He determines in pais upon the rights of the parties just as a judge would or should do if the case were before him in court. The law protects him from all the temptations to improper influence as fully as it does that of a judge in court. There is not, I am sure, a member of this body who would not revolt at the idea of a present made to a judge by one of the parties pending the controversy, or by one of the parties, and especially the prevailing party, after the decision was rendered. The present may be a small one; but that does not change the principle or the law of the case. To retain in the public mind full confidence in the purity and impartiality of a judicial officer, there should be no presents tendered or received, whether before or after a judicial decision. And for one I will never consent to give the high sanction of our legislation in support of any such practice. It is a well-recognized principle of both English and American law that the smallest gratuity, even a contribution by one of the parties to the necessary expenses of an arbitrator, would vitiate the award and set it aside. Upon grounds like these an award was set aside by Lord Chancellor Hardwicke more than a century ago. His words upon that occasion are worthy of being quoted. He says:

When arbitrators, let their character be otherwise never so unexceptionable, take money of one of the parties singly, whether for expenses or anything else, before making the award—as this is a matter of so tender a nature that even the appearance of evil in it is to be avoided, and this practice may be of dangerous example—it is sufficient cause to set aside the award; for, if this should be suffered, it will be hard to distinguish what is corruption.

It is true the doctrine here announced by this distinguished jurist It is true the doctrine here announced by this distinguished jurist only applies to some expenses paid to the arbitrator before the award, and perhaps this is all that the law in its imperfection can reach; but common sense teaches us that the expectation of reward may exercise an influence on the mind almost as fully as a reward actually given; and we, who are tied down by none of the technicalities of the courts, and must take an enlarged view of the motives which influence human action, if we believe that the practice of making presents subsequent to an award may by any possibility influence the decision in favor of the party most likely to make such presents, then we are bound to discountenance as practice which in the language of

we are bound to discountenance a practice which, in the language of Lord Hardwicke, "is of evil example," and may tend to corruption.

Mr. Speaker, as these applications for authority to accept presents from foreign states are rapidly multiplying, and as I have never seen in any commentary upon our Constitution or in any debate in Congress any explanation of the just limits of this power, I think it is time that we should reach some definite rules to govern us in the exercise of the functions devolved upon us by the Constitution. It is obvious that the enlightened framers of that instrument thought it improper, as a general practice, to permit an officer of this Government to accept from any king, prince, or foreign state any present or title of any kind whatever. But they foresaw that cases might or title of any kind whatever. But they foresaw that cases might occur in which such presents might be accepted with propriety, and they consequently vested in Congress the authority to determine when such exception should be made to the general prohibition. This devolves upon Congress not only the right, but the duty, of discrimination in all such cases; and while I would not undertake to decide for others, I have fully made up my mind that I will not by my vote further sanction this legislation, unless the case comes fully up to two essential conditions.

First. The act performed or service rendered for which this high

First. The act performed or service rendered for which this high distinction is asked should be of a character to be worthy of national acknowledgment. It is not a right demanded of Congress, but a distinction and a favor to be conferred by this body. It should be something worthy of such distinction. The French have well embodied this idea when they exclude from the Legion of Honor all who have not performed "les actions d'éclat," brilliant deeds, or rendered some not performed "les actions d'éclat," brilliant deeds, or rendered some extraordinary service in the cause of science, philosophy, and the arts, or in the interests of humanity. The English have recognized the idea when they forbid even the English sovereign to allow a subject of Her Majesty to accept the insignia of a foreign order from any sovereign of a foreign state, except such insignia or decoration shall be conferred "in consequence of active and distinguished services before the enemy either at sea or in the field." There should be something in the act performed worthy of the interposition of Congress, some act that when enshrined in the legislation of this body is worthy of remembrance for its own intrinsic merit.

remembrance for its own intrinsic merit.

Secondly. The present should not have its inducement in any transaction that militates in the slightest degree against the interests, the principles, or the policy of this country, nor should it be assented to by Congress if it conflicts in the remotest manner with any of those safeguards to the pure administration of justice which we have been taught to respect and cherish.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will say that the case presented by this joint resolution does not, in my opinion, come within either of these indispensable conditions.

I will further remark that I shall vote against giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by an officer of this Government of any title, insignia, or decoration conferred by a foreign prince or state and if I had no further reason to assign for this opposition, it would be sufficient for me to say that such titles and decorations cannot be reciprocated by our Government upon the subjects or citizens of other

History furnishes us with a very interesting anecdote, which is characteristic of the Virgin Queen of England after whom the State of my friend before me [Mr. Tucker] and my own State have been named. Henry IV of France invested two of the bravest and most gallant officers of the English auxiliaries with the collar of the Order of Saint Michael for the services they had done him in the war; but on their return to England they were committed to prison for daring to accept this honor from a foreign sovereign, and the decoration was ordered immediately takesent heart to the Ernsch woneren Herr Majesty. ordered immediately to be sent back to the French monarch, Her Majesty proudly observing, "that as a virtuous woman ought to look on none but her husband, so a subject ought not to cast his eyes on any other sovereign than that of his own country. I will not," said she, "have my sheep marked with a strange brand, nor suffer them to follow the pipe of a strange shepherd."

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will say most distinctly, that I believe the British government has been governed in this request by pure and honorable motives; and I will further say, that I have no reason to doubt that our minister, in the award which he rendered in this case, was controlled exclusively by considerations of equity and justice; but when called upon as a member of Congress to give my consent to the accentures of a present for indicial corriect surface. consent to the acceptance of a present for judicial service rendered as an arbitrator, I think the precedent a bad one, and ought not to be encouraged. I therefore move the indefinite postponement of this joint resolution of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of States for private bills has now been completed.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask the gentleman to withhold that motion for a moment to allow me to introduce for present action a joint resolution to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. BRIGHT. I yield to have the resolution read.

EXPENSES OF INDIAN DELEGATION.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Indian Affairs a joint resolution for the relief of the Turtle Mountain band of Chippewa Indians.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to pay, out of the funds appropriated for the support of the Indian Bureau, a sufficient amount to pay the board bill while in Washington and transportation to their homes of the Turtle Mountain band of Chippewa Indians, consisting of Little Shell, the chief of said band, and three headmen, all Indians, and one interpreter, provided that said amount shall not exceed the sum of $1,000.

Mr. HOOKER. I report this joint resolution at the instance of the entire Committee on Indian Affairs. This band or delegation of Indians have been here for the last two and a half or three months, and the expenses of their support are daily increasing; and upon an application being made the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] and myself, a subcommittee of the Committee on Indian Affairs, went to the Secretary of the Interior. He advised us that the contingent fund of $5,000 for the defraying of these expenses had been exhausted; that if any portion of it still remained in the Department he would not hesitate to appropriate it for the purpose, and he recommended such legislation as was necessary to accomplish the object. I therefore make this report, and unless some gentleman makes objection to the joint resolution I shall ask its immediate passage.

There was no objection, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 86) was received, read three times, and passed. entire Committee on Indian Affairs. This band or delegation of Inreceived, read three times, and passed.

Mr. HOOKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. BRIGHT. I now insist on my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, (Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, in the chair.)

LAND CLAIMS IN MISSOURI.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 819) to confirm certain land claims in the State of Missouri.

Mr. BUCKNER. I understand that there is to be some objection offered to this bill which I have reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims. My voice is not in such condition to-day that I can address the committee, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over for the present, not losing its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JAMES B. ARMSTRONG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 101) amendatory of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of James B. Armstrong, deceased," approved March 3; 1873.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Edward S. Armstrong, of Ralls County, Missouri, the sum of $1,673.14, it being his aliquot share of the sum of $13,385.09, as one of the brothers and next of kin of the said James B. Armstrong, deceased, appropriated by the said act for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of said James B. Armstrong, deceased.

The second section repeals the provision of said act requiring sat isfactory proof to be made to the Secretary of the Treasury that said heirs at law and next of kin or such thereof as shall demand their aliquot shares under and by virtue of said act remained loyal adherents to the cause and Government of the United States during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No-344) to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico.

The bill was read. It provides that private land claims numbered 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 73, 74, 75, 77, 78, 79, 80, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, and the Zia Santa Ana and Jemes Pueblo Indian claim, reported as Pueblo claim T, in the Territory of New Mexico, as known and designated by the numbers and letter aforesaid in the reports of the surveyor-general of said Territory, and on the books of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, be, and the same are thereby, confirmed in accordance with the grant by the Spanish or Mexican authorities, as the case may be, provided that such confirmation shall only be construed as a quitclaim, or relinquishment, of all title or claim on the part of the United States to any of the lands embraced in either of the said claims, and shall not affect the adverse rights of any person or persons to the same or

The second section authorizes and directs the Commissioner of the General Land Office, without unreasonable delay, to cause the lands embraced in said several claims to be surveyed and platted at the expense of the United States; and, upon the filing and approval of said surveys and plats in his Office, patents shall issue for said lands.

The third section provides that all surveys authorized by the act shall conform to, and be connected with, the public surveys of the United States in said Territory, so far as the same can be done consistently with the land-marks and boundaries specified in the several grants upon which said claims are founded; provided, that when said lands are so confirmed, surveyed, and patented they shall, in each case, be held and taken to be in full satisfaction of all further claims or demands against the United States for the lands embraced in said claims; provided further, that no grant bearing date since the 18th day of August, 1824, shall be confirmed or patent issue for more than eleven leagues of land for each original claimant or grantee under said Mexican government.

Mr. DUNNELL. I call for the reading of the report.

The report of the Committee on Private Land Claims was read, as follows:

The bill provides for the confirmation of certain private land claims in accordance with the grants by the Spanish or Mexican authorities; that such confirmation shall be construed only as a quitclaim or relinquishment of all title or claim on the part of the United States to any of the lands embraced in either of said claims; and that this act shall not affect the adverse rights of any person or persons to the same or any part thereof part of the United States to any of the lands embraced in either of said claims; and that this act shall not affect the adverse rights of any person or persons to the same or any part thereof.

Prior to August 24, 1821, the country now comprising the republic of Mexico and the Territory of New Mexico belonged to Spain; but by the treaty of Cordova, between Spain and Mexico, of that date, Spain acknowledged the independence of Mexico, and all this vast territory came within her legal jurisdiction.

Down to that time the vacant lands lying within the limits of what is now the Territory of New Mexico had been granted by the Spanish authorities, to any one who applied for them for the purpose of settlement and cultivation, in almost unlimited quantities.

The grants sought to be confirmed by this bill were all embraced within the limits of said Territory, and date back to a very early day, commencing in 1699, and extending from that time down to the deckaration of Mexican independence in 1821, since which time grants have been made by the Mexican government until the cession of said Territory to the United States in 1848.

On the 18th of August, 1824, some three years after this Territory came into the possession and under the jurisdiction of Mexico, a law or decree was passed by the Mexican Congress, termed a colonization law, which provided that the government, conformably to the principles established in said act, should proceed to the colonization of the territories embraced within the limits of said republic, and the government was required to take the steps necessary to carry into effect the government was required to take the steps necessary to carry into effect the said decree. Accordingly, on the 21st of August, 1828, a code of rules and regulations was prescribed, established, and promulgated by the government, designed to effect the object and intention of the said act.

Those regulations declared that the governors of said territories were authorized, in compliance with said act of 1824, and under the c persons, whether Mexicans or foreigners, who may ask for them for the purpose persons, whether Mexicans or foreigners, who may ask for them for the purpose of cultivating or inhabiting them.

By the decree of the Mexican Congress of August 18, 1824, before referred to, the governors of said territories were prohibited, after that date, from granting more than eleven square leagues of said vacant lands to any one person, and the last clause in the bill limits its effect to that amount.

Under the terms of the treaty of Gandalupe Hidalgo, between the United States and the republic of Mexico, in 1848, the Territory of New Mexico was ceded to this Government, and all grants of land in said Territory, made by either Spain or Mexico previous to said treaty, were to be protected by the United States Government, and the rights of all claimants and settlers under said grant were to be recognized and respected.

Mexico previous to said trenty, were to be protected by the United States Government, and the rights of all claimants and settlers under said grant were to be recognized and respected.

In 1854 Congress, in order to put the vacant lands in said Territory upon the market, open them up to settlers, and relieve the several Departments of the Government from the labor, annoyance, and enormous expense growing out of the settlement of these disputed land claims in said Territory, under the said Spanish and Mexican grants, passed an act by which it was provided that a surveyor-general should be appointed for New Mexico, whose duty it should be to ascertain the origin, nature, character, and extent of all claims to lands under the laws, usages, and customs of Spain and Mexico.

The said surveyor-general was authorized by said act to issue notices to the contesting parties in said land claims, summon witnesses before him, and do all acts necessary to a proper and full investigation of all the said disputed claims which might arise within his jurisdiction.

He was required, after a full hearing and examination of all the muniments of title and the proofs of each claimant, to make a detailed and complete report of all such claims as were based upon grants made previous to the cession of said Territory to the United States under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo in 1848, with his decision as to the validity or invalidity of each claim under the laws, usages, and customs of the country previous to said cession.

The said report was required to be made to the Secretary of the Interior, to be laid before Congress, with a view to confirm bona fide grants and claims, and thus give full effect to the treaty we have before referred to.

The committee find, after a careful investigation, that each one of the claims or grants sought to be confirmed by this bill has been fully heard, examined, and passed upon by the surveyor-general of said Territory, in compliance with the provisions of the said act of Congress of 1854; and that he h opinions. See the committee have been influenced to a great extent by the findings and decisions of the surveyor-general, owing to the fact that in the hearing upon each case before him he had all the oral and documentary evidence of title and possession, which we have been unable to obtain, and which we do not now deem important in view of his findings.

We believe that public policy, as well as justice to these claimants, demands that the rights to this property should be settled and known:

"In good faith and at great expense they have, in pursuance of our laws, appeared before the surveyor-general, and, after a patient examination of the whole case, have satisfied him that their claims are bona fide and ought to be confirmed; and hence the committee are of the opinion that it is but just and proper that they should be relieved from their anxiety in reference to this property, and that each one of said claims should be confirmed."

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of said bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill may be again reported.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill may be again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill embraces a very large district of land the title of which is vested in the United States by the treaty with Mexico, by which we acquired the Territory of New Mexico. The bill is exceedingly vague in its definitions. It refers to certain reports made by the surveyor-general, as I understand, of the Territory of New Mexico by numbers. The names of the persons who are supposed to be the owners of these lands by grants from Spain and from Mexico are not even mentioned to the House or incorporated into the bill nor is the extent of the lands the titles to which it is proposed. bill, nor is the extent of the lands the titles to which it is proposed to confirm indicated except by reference to these reports which are not in any way incorporated into the bill.

It is almost impossible to imagine an act of legislation more vague in its provisions. It disposes of a vast region of country, covering many leagues, but refers to documents which do not even seem to be before the House. If it is true that this report, which I presume is a voluminous document of the surveyor-general of New Mexico, is on the Clerk's desk, I ask that it may be read. And I trust the Clerk will find that report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that it is not with the bill Mr. HOLMAN. It is not even before the House. Any gentleman ion. This bill is can see what is the effect of this proposed legislation. This bill is intended to confirm titles both of grants originally made by Mexico prior to the acquisition of New Mexico by the United States in 1848 and also by grants made by the government of Spain.

The report says:

The grants sought to be confirmed by this bill were all embraced within the limits of said Territory, and date back to a very early day, commencing in 1699, and extending from that time down to the declaration of Mexican independence in 1821, since which time grants have been made by the Mexican government until the cession of said Territory to the United States in 1848.

I understand that these confirmations of titles do not apply to grants made after 1824, three years after the declaration of independence by Mexico from the government of Spain. I must object to this bill on account of its vagueness and want of definition of exactly what its account of its vagueness and want of definition of exactly what its effect will be and what its provisions are. I think it should itself indicate by description in some general form of the lands to be vested, and not leave it to the action of some ministerial officer of the Government, not do it by reference to records which are not even before the House. I think the persons who are to be the recipients of the benefits of this legislation should appear in some form or other and that there should be some description of the amount of land and the number of persons interested. It may involve a large description both of property and persons by a designation of their names, but, sir, this is a very large transaction. I infer from the reading of the report from the Clerk's desk that it covers hundreds and thousands of acres of land. Perhaps the gentleman having charge of the bill will explain to us the extent of this grant.

The titles to lands which were unquestionably good, where there was no doubt but what the property was private property when by the treaty with Mexico we acquired this region of country, have long since been confirmed. For many years after 1848 the legislation of Congress was largely employed in confirming titles to land claims under grants by Mexico and earlier grants made by the government of Spain. For many years after 1848 it was a fruitful source of legislative enactments, and the general belief is that all of the unquestionably good grants that were made in good faith by the respective governments of Spain and Mexico, where the conditions of the grants had been fully complied with, had been confirmed by our Government and the titles of the lands had passed to the persons entitled to the lands. But it must be borne in mind that all of these grants were made on conditions. The chain of titles by which grants are shown would be itself very vague, indefinite, and uncertain evidence. Where grants were well established and the evidence was complete and the conditions had been complied with, I presume legislation has already been had, though no doubt a great body of cases have come down to us of an uncertain character.

But, sir, we are proposing to appropriate a very large portion of the public lands and pass the title of it into the hands of private claim-Of course if the grants were bona fide, made by either Spain or Mexico, and the conditions have been complied with, why, the title ought to be confirmed by our Government. We agreed to confirm them by the treaty, but many years since this Government began to legislate on the subject. How does it happen that at this remote day this vast body of claims should come down for adjudication?

Another thing to which I desire to call the attention of the committee, Mr. Chairman, is the latter clause of the second section of the bill, which provides that the surveys shall be made of these hundreds of thousands of acres of land for the benefit of these private parties at the expense of the United States. I hope gentlemen will appreciate that this is an important provision. Here are vast bodies of country to be surveyed, not merely in their outlines, but subdivided as the lands of the United States are subdivided into sections, half as the lands of the United States are subdivided into sections, half sections, and quarter sections, for the benefit of the private parties whose titles are to be confirmed. Why, after this lapse of time, is that expense to be borne by the Government? I should like to hear from the gentleman reporting this bill on what ground he assumes that the United States should be held responsible through its Treasury for the expenses of making these surveys. If Mexico granted these lands to private parties, and the terms on which they were granted have been complied with, and it is desirable that the grantees should have their lands subdivided so as to make them immediately available, why is it that the Government of the United States should available, why is it that the Government of the United States should bear that expense? And when gentlemen remember that the expense of the surveys of the public lands constitutes a very important item of expenditure the importance of this provision will appear. Sir, I think this bill should not pass without a clearer definition of what it proposes to accomplish, some descriptions of the lands which are referred to in the report simply by reference to the records, some names of the parties who are to participate in what may be a bounty on the part of the Government, rather than an act of justice in conon the part of the Government, rather than an act of justice in confirming former titles, some statement of what this legislative enactment is, so that this House may know exactly the effect of the passage of such a bill as this. I object to the bill itself; it is on account of the reasons I have sought to urge upon the House. I especially object to the provision of the bill by which the Federal Treasury is to be required to pay the expenses of these surveys for the benefit of these parties. These parties do not claim under our Government. If they did why the Government wight reproduct heavy the consequence. they did, why the Government might properly bear the expenses. They claim adversely to the Government under Spain, under Mexico, and under the treaty of 1848 by which this territory was acquired. If this vast domain is to be granted to these parties and surveyed, I insist that it should be done at the expense of the parties themselves.

I therefore move to strike out in line 4 of section 2 the words "at the expense of the United States."

Mr. JOYCE. I shall object to any amendment to this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend cannot avoid amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and amendments are in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Amendments are in order, and also debate, as my Mr. HOLMAN. Amendments are in order, and also debate, as my friend will find out. And my friend will discover the advantage to the public interests, how well the public interests are protected by this rule of the House allowing no limit to debate in the Committee of the Whole except under the hour rule, and also allowing amendments. My friend himself, when he shall have obtained the experience in this House which I hope he will obtain, will see the importance of debate and amendment upon bills of this character.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.
Mr. BUCKNER. How does the gentleman expect the Government of the United States to ascertain what its own lands are until these surveys shall have been made?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will answer my friend with great pleasure. It is not proposed at this time by the Government of the United States to proceed with the survey of the public lands in the Territory of New Mexico. It is therefore not important at this time that the Government should ascertain what other lands there are to be surveyed.

I will call the attention of my friend from Missouri [Mr. Buckner] to a practice which was deemed very just, so just that notwithstand-ing appeals have been made to both branches of Congress for three years to change the practice, neither branch has yet consented to reverseit. I refer to this: Whenever we make a grant of public lands to a railroad corporation, we incorporate in the bill making the grant a provision that the survey should be made at the expense of the corporation receiving the grant. We have steadily adhered to that practice as a Before the patent is issued for the land so granted the corporation is required to refund to the public Treasury the expense incurred by the Government in making the survey. My friend will remember the case to which I refer, where for three years an effort was made to induce the Government to vary from that rule, the case presented being as strong a case as could be possibly presented, and the Congress has refused to depart from this rule. The question has been asked, Shall the Government give lands to these corporations, and at the same time incur the expense of surveying the lands so granted in order to make them available? and the answer has invalinable to the control of the con riably been in the negative It is proposed by this bill to survey lands belonging to private par-ties, not for the convenience and advantage of the Government of ties, not for the convenience and advantage of the Government of the United States in making sales of these lands or allowing them to be taken under the homestead law, but for the benefit of private parties; and it is proposed that the survey shall be made at the expense of the Government. That cannot be defended; no precedent can be referred to for such a practice. Gentlemen must remember, and I want my young friend [Mr. JOYCE] to bear in mind, that you are proposing here, by this bill, to withdraw hundreds of thousands of acres of the public lands, under vague, shadowy grants, where no actual possession was ever had of them by the claimants; you are proposing to withdraw these lands from the operation of that humane, that loftler policy of our Government, of securing the public lands to actual setpolicy of our Government, of securing the public lands to actual settlers under the homestead law. You are proposing by this bill to give to a single individual or claimant as high as forty-nine thousand acres of land, instead of dividing that land up into numbers of homeacres of land, instead of dividing that land up into numbers of homesteads for the benefit of actual settlers. It would require very strong proof of the grant either by Mexico or by Spain to justify, in my judgment, this monopoly of the public lands anywhere in this country. Mr. ELKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. The gentleman styles these lands "public lands."

By what authority does he call them public lands?

Mr. HOLMAN. These are public lands, unless they were granted by Spain or Mexico.

by Spain or Mexico

Mr. ELKINS. That is just what the bill says, that they were granted by the Spanish and Mexican governments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand all the features of this "old settler." My friend must not think that an old claim like this is not known

Mr. ELKINS. Then the gentleman should not misstate.

Mr. HOLMAN. They are public lands unless the grant of them has actually been made. Perhaps my friend will tell us how it happened that so long a period of time has elapsed since we acquired this Territory in 1848, and these titles, if they are against our Government, have not been confirmed in some of the constant acts of legislation that occurred for twenty years after that time, especially for the first fifteen years—how does it happen that these claims now crop out? Some of these claims, it is said, run back as far as 1699. Now, if these grants have actually been in the possession of the claimants, actually held by them, then this long period of possession would itself be sufficient. But my friend will not pretend that there was possession. These are shadowy claims and titles. I have never heard one of these grants carefully discussed in this House, when you had the decourse thefore you that the shadowy character of the slaim was document before you, that the shadowy character of the claim was not apparent in one or two respects, either in respect to the original grant or the compliance with the conditions of the grant. Most if not all of these grants were made upon the condition of settlement, and in most cases no settlement has been made upon them.

I move to strike out the words "United States" in the second section, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "parties respectively asserting claims to said lands;" so that this survey shall be at the expense of the claimants.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a modification of the gentleman's pre-

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir. I now move to strike out, and to insert after the word "expense" the words "of the parties respectively asserting claim to such land."

Mr. JOYCE. Mr. Chairman, this bill which I had the honor to report to this House underwent a very close and careful examination, in the first place before a subcommittee, and then before the whole committee; and the committee were unanimous in reporting in favor of the passage of the bill.

It appeared before the committee that in 1821 the government of Spain acknowledged the independence of Mexico; and in consequence of that acknowledgment the land now embraced within the Territory of New Mexico came under the jurisdiction of the Mexican government By treaty stipulations between those two high contracting parties it became the duty of the Mexican government to take care of and protect the land titles that had been granted by the Spanish government previous to its acknowledgment of the independence of Mexico. These grants which are sought to be confirmed by this bill reach back, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] has said, to 1699, and extend from that period through the time that Spain and Mexico held possession of this territory.

In 1824, some three years after the acknowledgment of Mexican independence, a law or decree was passed by the Mexican Congress, called the colonization law, by which the governors of the various portions of territory or provinces now embraced in the Territory of New Mexico were empowered to grant these vacant lands to persons who applied for it for the purpose of settlement and cultivation or persons who had rendered important services, either civil or military, to the Mexican government. In 1828 a certain set of rules and regulations were established by the Mexican authorities in regard to these lands; and under this decree of 1824 and these rules of 1828 a provision was adopted limiting the amount of land that could be granted to any one individual to eleven square leagues. There was incorporated into the treaty between the United States and Mexico in 1848, known as the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, a similar provision as in the treaty between Spain and Mexico, making it binding upon the United States Government to take care of and protect these land grants which had been made not only under the Spanish authorities but also under the Mexican authorities subsequently to 1821.

As gentlemen will see by reference to the report of the committee, Congress and the different Departments of our Government were for some time annoyed by these claimants, who were continually coming here for settlement of these old Spanish and Mexican land grants. Hence in 1854 Congress enacted a law providing for the appointment of a surveyor-general, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and whose duties are fully set forth in the report of the committee. This officer was authorized by that act to issue notices to the contesting parties in these land claims, summon witnesses before him, and do all acts necessary to a proper and full investiga-tion of all the said disputed claims which might arise within his juris-

He was required, after a full hearing and examination of all the muniments of title and the proofs of each claimant, to make a detailed and complete report of all such claims as were based upon grants made previous to the cession of said Territory to the United States under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo in 1848, with his decision as to the validity or invalidity of each claim under the laws, usages, and customs of the content toms of the country previous to the cession.

Now, by reference to this bill it appears that there are a large number of these grants that are now sought to be confirmed by this legis-The committee took pains in each one of these cases to refer back to the report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico to see what conclusion he had come to in regard to these claims; and it will be seen that the law of 1854 made special provision that the surveyor-general should hold a regular court. He was to have a full trial upon each one of these cases. He was authorized to issue his notices and subpenas to call parties and witnesses before him, and then a full hearing was to be had. Each claimant came before him, produced all the evidences of his title; all his muniments of title and all his evidence in regard to the cession were put in. Then, if there were contesting parties, of course they were cited to appear, and they had a hearing before this surveyer-general. So that when this officer was through with this trial, the whole matter was adjudicated. He had everything before him, the evidence of all the parties upon all sides in regard to all these contested claims. He had the whole matter before him; and there was a perfect adjudication upon each one of these claims

I said, Mr. Chairman, that the committee had taken pains to go back and look into the history of this matter and see how each one of these claims had been passed upon by the surveyor-general of New Mexico; and in every one of them, without a single exception from beginning to end, there has been a trial before the surveyor-general upon the ground where all the evidence could be collected, where the parties resided, where the records were all kept, where the testimony could all be obtained. In every one of these cases there was a full and complete trial; and in each case the surveyor-general of New Mexico reported to the Secretary of the Interior and to Congress that these claims were bona fide claims, and should be confirmed by Congress. For, Mr. Chairman, by reference to the law of 1854, it will be found that it made further provision that after this hearing, this full adjudication of the matter before the surveyor-general, he should make his report to the Secretary of the Interior that this officer might lay the report before Congress, and that Congress might, if the claims were bona fide, confirm them to the claimants.

Mr. Chairman, I did not suppose that it was possible for any member of this House or any committee to make a report and bring in a bill that would be satisfactory to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Holman.] Nobody expected that; but we did suppose, and do now, that we have a case here in which the facts are so patent and plain upon their face that the House will not hesitate for a moment to consent to the passage of this bill.

Now the gentleman says, how does it happen these cases are so old, that they have been held back for these long years? For the plainest and best reason in the world, and that is because, in the first place, Mr. Chairman, it took years for these people to get their claims to-gether, to get evidence of their claims in shape to present before the surveyor-general. You will remember also that it was not until surveyor-general. You will remember also that it was not until 1854 that this office of surveyor-general was established so that these claims could be presented to him for consideration.

Mr. DE BOLT. How much land is contained in this grant?

Mr. JOYCE. If the gentleman will not interrupt me I will answer him when I get through, if he desires to ask any questions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it was not until 1854 there was any court established by which these claims could be adjudicated. These claimants came here to Congress session after session, made their applications and went away without any result at all. Since 1854 they have been most diligent in regard to this matter; they have got up their testi-mony and presented it before the surveyor-general, made up their claims and come here with his recommendation in every solitary case that the claim is valid and good and the grant ought to be confirmed

Another thing in regard to this bill. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] says these are imaginary claims. He intimates that there is no foundation for them. By looking at these papers, by going back and examining the papers in each one of these cases find that those who are asking Congress to-day to confirm these grants are either the legal representatives or the heirs of the person to whom the grants were originally made, or the grantees themselves, and those grantees or their heirs or personal representatives have been from the day the grants were made down to the present time, and are now, in possession of these lands in the Territory of New Mexico. It is not, therefore, any mysterious claim; not some "trumpedup" thing brought in here. Not by any means, for the title was fully made out before the surveyor-general in each one of these cases.

The gentleman says that the Government ought not to be put The gentleman says that the Government organ to the expense of surveying these lands. Sir, the Government never would have been called upon to make any survey of these lands had it not been for the fact that it has refused to issue patents to the men who own these lands and claim them to-day. That is the the men who own these lands and claim them to-day. That is the only reason. If the Government of the United States had not refused patents these claimants would not come up here to-day asking Congress to survey these lands at the expense of the Government. These grants were made by the Spanish and Mexican authorities to these people who took possession at the time and have held them, either themselves, their heirs, or their personal representatives, ever since. Is it unfair, is it unjust, if now, after these long years of delay and waiting, they come to Congress and ask the United States Gov ernment to treat these lands in the same way it treats other public lands? that is, allow the surveyor to go on and survey them so they may know the boundaries of their possessions and the Government may know what are its boundaries.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in regard to another matter. Here you will perceive, and the committee will perceive, that each one of these claims is referred to by number. As I understand it, they are the numbers given them by the surveyor-general; that each one of these claims has been marked out on the plat of the Government land and numbered in this manner. It seems to me that is all that is necessary in this regard; that it is all that any gentleman can really ask or desire in regard to the location of these lands or the amount of Whatever may be the amount, it is the amount included in each one of these numbered plats. It is the land these people are in possession of, the land granted to them or their ancestors years ago by the Spanish and Mexican authorities, the land they are now claiming before Congress. The land so claimed, and the grant of which is asked to be confirmed, is the land referred to in each one of these numbers. Perhaps the committee might have taken the pains, but it would have taken longer than this session, to have a map made of each one of these parcels of land and brought in here for the satisfaction of the gentleman from Indiana and others, showing the number of rods and perches contained in each one of these pieces of land. But we did not do so. We examined, as I said before, all the evidence presented before the surveyor-general in each and every one of these cases to see that in each case there was a full hearing and a full finding, and we largely based our report upon the adjudication in these different cases by the surveyor-general.

It seems to me the bill is properly protected in every way. Certainly, if it is not, there is no feeling on the part of the committee but to do exact justice as between these claimants and the United States and parties who may have conflicting interests. I repeat, it seems to me the bill is particularly well guarded in all these respects, and therefore, after looking the matter all over, I believe it is the greatest hardship to these men, after having kept them waiting for greatest nardship to these men, after having kept them waiting for years and years, now to refuse to confirm these grants. They have as much title to the lands as if they had paid money for them. Their ancestors paid for them in service to the Mexican and Spanish governments. They always have been in possession of them, and they come now and ask as a matter of justice that their claims shall be confirmed. They cannot sell them or mortgage them. They can do nothing but squat upon them until the Government has given its decision in their favor.

This is all I desire to say in record to this results.

This is all I desire to say in regard to this matter. It seems to me that the bill is well guarded, and that there can be no valid reason why the claims of these bona fide grantees and their heirs should not be

Mr. BLAND. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I understand there have been efforts made to procure patents from the Department for these grants. I wish to know why the Land Office has not issued patents, and if there has been any ruling of the Land Office with reference to these claims?

Mr. JOYCE. The proper officer whose business it is to issue the patents cannot do it until the grants are confirmed by Congress

Mr. BLAND. I desire to ask the gentleman another question. How much land do these grants cover?

Mr. JOYCE. That question I cannot answer at this moment.

Mr. BLAND. Has there been any communication with the Land Department in reference to this bill; and, if so, what is their recommendation? Mr. JOYCE. There was a communication between the Committee on Private Land Claims and the officers of the Land Office. Of course that was the first place the subcommittee went to to get information in regard to it.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Before the gentleman from Vermont resumes his seat, I desire to ask him how much land is embraced in

Mr. JOYCE. The same question was asked a moment ago by the gentleman on my left. It is impossible for me at this moment to state the exact number of acres.

Mr. REAGAN. It has been stated by the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims that the titles which it is proposed shall be confirmed by this bill are honest, good titles in the hands of possessors. If that be so, what is the necessity for a law to confirm those titles? By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of 1848 the rights of all Mexican citizens in the territory acquired by that treaty are secured to them; land, and everything else. And the treaty goes further, and as to those Mexicans who desired to retain their original nationality and remove from the acquired territory into Mexico, their rights were reserved to them, with the privilege of selling or disposing of their lands as a citizen of the United States could do. Every grant that was a grant under Spain or Mexico was vested in the grantees by this treaty. If there was no title vested in the grantees, and if there were inchoate claims to lands, those were under the control of the Government, and it was competent for the Government, as in the case of the Louisiana Territory and Florida, to adopt such provisions as would secure to the claimants whatever equity might exist on account of these inchoate titles.

I take an interest in this bill because for thirty-seven years I have been looking at the history of the establishment of enormous Mexican claims, which in very many instances were fraudulent and without equity. And as the chairman of the committee may not be acquainted with the system under which these grants originated and with the facts upon which these claims were predicated, and may be feeling, as he has suggested, that justice requires the confirmation of these grants, it occurs to me that it is better to look at some ques-tions that underlie this matter, and see whether he has not been mistions that underlie this matter, and see whether he has not been misled as to the facts, as to the equities in this case, and as to the duties of the Government in relation to these grants. If, as he says, they were honest titles under Spain and Mexico, then they need no help from us. They need no help, and the owners of them can vindicate their titles in the courts of the country, as any gentleman here can vindicate a title resting upon a patent from the Government of the United States. In that case they want no legislation.

We are asked here to confirm nearly fifty grants. The act of 1854 says that none of them shall contain more than eleven leagues of land.
How much is that, sir? Forty-nine thousand and odd agrees. We

How much is that, sir? Forty-nine thousand and odd acres. We propose to confirm here forty-eight grants, each of which may possibly contain more than 49,000 acres. And yet, important as this is, the chairman, who feels so deep an interest in this matter, is unable to give the committee information whether these grants contain 49 acres or 49,000 acres each. It seems to me that where titles to tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of acres are to be confirmed, it is somewhat incumbent on the committee to have given us some information as to the extent of these grants and the amount of land covered by them.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Does he mean to say that there ought to be a difference as to the action of the committee whether the grant be ten acres or ten thousand acres?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir. I do not mean to say that the principle would be different, but I mean to say that the fact is so important a one that it ought to have been made known to this House through its organ charged with the investigation of a set of claims that may amount to 2,604,160 acres of land; and that in the face of the fact that if they had good titles they needed no legislation. If they had inchoate claims and not titles, they ought in good faith to have made that fact known to the Government and honestly to have asked for whatever equities grew out of their inchoate claims, and not ask Congress to confirm these inchoate claims in fraud of the rights of the Government and possibly of the rights of other citizens.

Mr. BUCKNER. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to make

Mr. BUCKNER. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to make this statement—because his argument seems to be proceeding on an incorrect idea—that the Government of the United States, recognizing that there were inchoate titles in the Territory of New Mexico which they were bound to confirm by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, authorized the surveyor-general as a judicial officer to take jurisdiction of these matters and to decide whether these claims were binding on the Government of the United States or not. This officer has reported in accordance with the law, and his report has been approved at the Land Office of the Interior Department, and it is now a question whether Congress shall approve of the judgment of this That is all.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Missouri is a little mistaken as to the terms of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo if he understands it to mean that the Government of the United States bound itself to recognize inchoate claims to land. It only bound itself to respect titles or rights of property. I have stated the rule that would apply to this, as it was made to apply to the Territories of Louisiana and Florida, that the Government should have the control of the equities in regard to the inchoate claims to lands.

What I said was that honesty, fair dealing, and a direct course required that if these claimants had inchoate claims they should present that fact and enable the Government to decide upon the ques-tion of equities which grew out of their inchoate claims, and not come here and ask us to do an unnecessary act in confirming valid titles.

Mr. BUCKNER. If these parties have perfect titles under the Spanish government they can assert their titles; but some of these titles are imperfect and inchoate, and therefore it is necessary that the record of their rights should be provided for by legislation.

Mr. REAGAN. I regret, Mr. Chairman, to be drawn into a discussion of a question like this without having had an opportunity to carefully examine it beforehand, and I only enter upon it because of the multiplied frauds that I have seen grow out of the claims under Mexican titles by which the foulest wrongs have been inflicted on the people of the State from which I come and of other States. I desire now to call attention to the eighth section of the act of July 22, 1854, and to direct the attention of the House to its meaning and effect. It provides—

That it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general, under such instructions as may be given by the Secretary of the Interior, to ascertain the origin, nature, character, and extent of all claims to lands under the laws, usages, and customs of Spain and

Now, it is said here that it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general to ascertain the extent of the grants, but the committee do not

And for this purpose may issue notices, summons witnesses, administer oaths, and do and perform all other necessary acts in the premises. He shall make a full report on all such claims as originated before the cession of the Territory to the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of 1848, denoting the various grades of title—

I do not know what "grades of title" means; and we should hardly be able to learn the legal meaning of these words by looking into the laws of Spain, Mexico, and the Indies, under which these claims must have originated-

have originated—with his decision as to the validity or invalidity of each of the same under the laws, usages, and customs of the country before its cession to the United States; and shall also make a report in regard to all pueblos existing in the Territory, showing the extent and locality of each, stating the number of inhabitants in the said pueblos respectively, and the nature of their titles to the land; such report to be made according to the form which may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, which report shall be laid before Congress for such action thereon as may be deemed just and proper, with a view to confirm bona fide grants and give full effect to the treaty of 1848 between the United States and Mexico; and, until the final action of Congress on such claims, all lands covered thereby shall be reserved from sale or other disposal by the Government, and shall not be subject to the donations granted by the previous provisions of this act.

Now the point to which I wish particularly to call attention in this section is that the chairman of the committee informs us that the surveyor-general has summoned his witnesses before him to try the titles of these lands. An executive officer, not a judicial officer—a surveyor in the field, not a court of record—has done this. Under what system of laws were these titles tried?

Were they tried before a jury? The Constitution provides that a man shall not be deprived of his right to property except by trial before a jury. Was it the office of the surveyor-general to try titles to land, or was he merely permitted to go there and furnish information on which the Government should act in determining how far it on which the Government should act in determining how far it would respect the equity that may have existed under these inchoate claims to these lands? He was not sent there to try titles. It was for a court with a judge and jury, with its records and rules of evidence and of pleading, to do that. He as an executive officer was only authorized to collect information to enable the Government to determine the extent of the validity of the equities, and not to decide on the validity of titles, as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Joyce] suggested. He could not do that; he did not do it; and we are not furnished yet to-day, as I understand what has been said on this subnished yet to-day, as I understand what has been said on this subject, with one word in relation to the nature, character, and extent of the equities of these claimants under the law, but we are furnished with an argument to show that they have got honest, valid titles—that was the language of the gentleman from Vermont—and that they have been adjudicated, tried, and determined in the field without a intermediate of the state of t jury, without a record, without anything that usually accompanies a court clothed by the law and the Constitution with the right to determine questions of title.

Mr. BUCKNER. The title is against the United States and not against other parties. The bill provides that it shall not affect adverse titles. It is a mere act of confirmation.

Mr. REAGAN. Then let Congress provide for the confirmation of equitable claims, not for validating good titles. Under this law there may be tracts of 5,000 or of 49,500 acres of land claimed. How can we know the extent of the conflicting claims to those lands? My experience has been that under Mexican titles, whatever their origin, when they get before any sort of tribunal or commission specially appointed to ascertain the rights of claimants under them, the claimants never get less than they claim, but often much more than they ought to have. I do not know that it is so here, but that is my experience with the history of claims of this kind, and I suspect that there is a great deal in that direction.

But I want to call especial attention to this: What assurance have we that a claim may not be brought here involving 50,000 acres of land, which covers the whole of the claims of thirty or forty other claimants who are just as equitably entitled to the land as the claimants in whose favor the report is made? What evidence have we before us to enable us to determine that in the confirmation of any one of these grants we shall not be striking down the rights of ten or twenty persons who have just as good rights as the claimant for every title we confirm? Besides, did the Government of the United States on the acquisition of this territory ever promise that it would carry out the Spanish or Mexican system of colonization, by giving eleven leagues of land to each settler? Our policy is to give one hundred and sixty acres to each actual settler, and we think we are pretty liberal in doing that. We did not inherit the system of Spain and Mexico of giving eleven leagues of land to each settler; we never proposed or agreed to adopt and continue any such system, and we never consented to execute any such grants where they remained unexecuted under the laws of that country. This being so, then as a duty which we owe to the Government and to the citizens of this country who may not know of the existence and to the citizens of this country who may not know of the existence of this bill in this House, I say that we should move slowly; we should know our ground; we should see that we are not wronging the Government out of milions of acres of land, that we are not wronging hundreds and thousands of the people of New Mexico out of rights just as good as these, who have just as strong equities as those who come here with their inchoate claims and ask this Government to confirm them into titles. firm them into titles.

It is suggested by a friend near me that this bill may embrace mineral lands. Of course it embraces mineral lands and everything else. 1 think it is meant to embrace everything.

I now want to call attention to the proviso of the first section of this bill, which goes to the question of confirmation of these titles. The section provides "that private-land claims No. 49," and so on to 104, "and the Zia Santa Ana and Jemes Pueblo Indian claim" "shall be confirmed in accordance with the grant by the Spanish or Mexican authorities, as the case may be." Now, what I have to say to the chairman of this committee and to all who are interested in this bill is that, if this language is correct, if they are "grants" from Spain or Mexico, then it is a superfluous act for us to provide for confirming them under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, which itself confirms them. If this is a correct recital, then the action of Congress now invoked is unnecessary. If it is not a correct recital in that respect, then it is wrong in concealing from us the facts upon which it is proposed that we shall act. If it is a fact that they are but incheate claims, then we have no evidence of the extent of the equities created under these inchoate claims.

The proviso of this section is to this effect:

That such confirmation shall only be construed as a quitclaim or relinquishment of all title or claim on the part of the United States to any of the lands embraced in either of the said claims, and shall not affect the adverse rights of any person or persons to the same or any part thereof.

"Not affect adverse rights!" Yet it is intended to confirm inchoate equities and to exercise a power which has been often construed to take away from all other claimants who have rights in inchoate equities all power to have their titles confirmed. Give these claimants a Government title, and, whatever the purpose of this bill may be, you will cut off all power from any other person holding an inchoate claim to contest the title issued by the Government of the United States.

Therefore this bill is not correct in that respect—is not right.

In conclusion what I have to say is that it seems to me a little strange that in the other Territories of this Union the Government thinks itself liberal and wise when it secures to actual settlers under its pre-emption and homestead laws one hundred and sixty acres each to all of the toiling millions who will go there and sixty acres each to all of the toiling millions who will go there and settle upon the public land and improve and occupy it, while here in New Mexico it is asked to consent, as a part of its policy, to give 49,500 acres of land to a like settler. Are we going to do such a thing as that? If we are going to give an inchoate claimant in New Mexico that much land, why not say that, in Montana, or in Idaho, or in any of the other Territories, he who first settles on the public lands shall be entitled to 40,500 acres and that all others who are there to settle must titled to 49,500 acres, and that all others who go there to settle must buy their lands of him? Shall we do that?

I regret to be called upon to discuss a question like this when I had not a moment's warning of the existence of this bill until I heard the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] But from a somewhat prolonged acquaintance with this description of land titles, and from a somewhat extended knowledge of the frauds by which they have been from time to time confirmed, I felt it to be a duty to the rights and interests of the Government and of the people of New Mexico to make this brief exposition of the principles involved in this bill, and to enter this earnest protest against the wrong you will commit against the government and the people of New Mexico, and all the laudless people of this country who are seeking homes, if you pass this bill.

Mr. ELKINS. I thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] very much indeed for pretending to help, as he claims, the citizens of New Mexico by his argument here. But I will tell him that this bill is framed in the interest of the people of New Mexico, and the gentleman mistakes the proposition and does not understand the bill of which he is speaking when he says it is not in the interest of the people of New Mexico.

A great deal has been said by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Rea-GAN] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] about the injustice and the vagueness and the indefiniteness of these private land claims. Now, I challenge either one of those gentlemen to show wherein there is anything vague or anything even approaching to it in any one of these claims from beginning to end. I beg here to inform this committee of the history of these private land claims. The gentleman from Texas, with his distinguished career as a lawyer and a public man, ought to know how New Mexico became a part of the territory of the Government of the United States. It was obtained by conquest and by treaty.

One of the articles of that treaty provides that the people who shall remain in the Territory and become citizens of the United States shall be protected in their property without any tax or charge on the part of the Government of the United States. Just here I want to tell the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Holman,] when he talks about the expenses of the Government in adjudicating and surveying these private-land claims, that it is in accordance with the treaty in which this Government has severelly pladged its faith to protect these peoples. this Government has sacredly pledged its faith to protect these people that these lands should be surveyed at the expense of the Government; and I will tell him for his information (although he seems to hold all the information on these subjects bundled up within his own head) that the Commissioner of the General Land Office, from year to year in his reports, has recommended that these grants shall be surveyed at the expense of the Government as a matter of justice to the owners thereof. At the last session of Congress the Committee on Appropriations recommended an appropriation of $10,000 for the survey of private land claims. Yet the gentleman says that this measure is without precedent. I hope he will excuse me for suggesting that he does understand the facts in this case.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not say there was no precedent. I said that the precedents on this subject did not justify this policy. I knew what the precedents had been.

Mr. ELKINS. I am very sorry if I misunderstood the gentleman.

But, sir, the survey of these grants has been recommended time and again, and at the last session this House voted, as I have stated, $10,000 for the survey of private land claims in New Mexico. intend, if the committee will indulge me, to explain, so far as I can, the history of these private land grants and urge some reasons in support of the bill under consideration. In the first place, I want to call the attention of the committee to one of the provisions of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, by which New Mexico was ceded to the United States.

Article 8 says:

Article 8 says:

Mexicans now established in Territories previously belonging to Mexico, and which remain for the future within the limits of the United States as defined by the present treaty, shall be free to continue where they now reside, or to remove at any time to the Mexican Republic, retaining the property which they possess in the said Territories, or disposing thereof, and removing the proceeds wherever they please, without their being subjected on this account to any contribution, tax, or charge whatever.

Those who shall prefer to remain in the said Territories may either retain the title and rights of Mexican citizens or acquire those of citizens of the United States; but they shall be under the obligation to make their election within one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty; and those who shall remain in the said Territories after the expiration of that year without having declared their intention to retain the character of Mexicans, shall be considered to have elected to become citizens of the United States.

In the said Territories, property of every kind, now belonging to Mexicans not established there, shall be inviolably respected.

The present owners, the heirs of these, and all Mexicans who may hereafter acquire said property by contract, shall enjoy with respect to it guarantees equally ample as if the same belonged to citizens of the United States.

It will be borne in mind that in 1850 this country became a part of

It will be borne in mind that in 1850 this country became a part of the United States. In 1854, as soon as the question could be understood, the Congress of the United States, at the instance of the people of New Mexico, who demanded that the titles to the grants made to them and their ancestors by the Spanish and Mexican governments should be quieted and adjusted, and in obedience to the treaty, passed the act "to establish the office of surveyor-general of New Mexico, Kansas, and Nebraska," &c., the eighth section of which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] has read. It was not for the people of New Mexico to question this law but to obey it, although ladmit that it was not a law fair to the people, but one under which they have been embarrassed and delayed in securing a recognition of their titles for twenty years; but nevertheless it was the law. That law provided "that it should be the duty of the surveyor-general, under such instructions as might be given to him, to ascertain the origin, nature, character, and extent of all claims to lands under the laws, usages, and customs of Spain and Mexico, and for this purpose to perform all other necessary acts in the premises. He shall make a full report on all such claims as originated before the cession of the territory to the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo,"

Here, sir, the power and authority to examine and pass upon these grants was vested in the surveyor-general, wisely or not I will not pretend to say. Certainly the act proved burdensome enough to the people and put them to great expense in proving up and establishing the titles to the grants upon which they lived.

But what could the people do but follow this law? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] talks about inchaate rights and titles. Sir, these are absolute grants, and vest a title in the grantees just as valid and good as the title under which the gentleman holds the house in which he lives. There is nothing inchoate, nothing imperfect in these grants; they are absolute.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question: If these are absolute grants, perfect grants, what is the use of this legislation?

Mr. ELKINS. I will answer the gentleman, and I beg to be interrupted by all such questions. These are absolute grants; but the Government of the United States does not know where they are sitnated nor how to distinguish them from public lands. The surveyors of the Government lands have in many instances run the public lines over them, and thus they have been made the subject of pre-emption and homestead. In this way unutterable confusion has arisen. This matter has been fruitful of litigation and expense to the people. How can these claimants establish a good title so long as the title of the United States is not relinquished in some formal way? The Government of the United States has no legal right to these grants. Ejectments can be maintained upon these titles, and have been, in the courts against trespassers and persons claiming without title. But, sir, the time is coming when the public lands of the Government must be located and determined and when private land grants must be known as to their extent and limits. That is the reason this bill in the grants with the Carlot of the Court of the Carlot of the Ca It is both in the interest of the grantee and the Govis necessary.

Does not the gentleman from Texas know that in California there was a commission for a long time adjudicating claims of this kind, the Government confirming the grants, and the surveys made at the cost of the Government and patents granted? The gentleman must know that similar questions have arisen in connection with the cession of Louisiana territory from France. These are not new questions. In the gentleman's own State they are to-day adjudicating Mexican grants made prior to the independence of Texas.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it is easy for gentlemen to get up here and talk about indefiniteness; it is easy to make objection to any bill that comes before Congress; but when any gentleman can present here good reasons why these grants should not be confirmed, I am confident such reasons will receive respectful consideration and be fully

What did the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JOYCE] having charge of this bill suggest? That his committee—as intelligent possibly as any committee in this House—had considered each of these cases. I want to state what each case means. Take No. 49 for instance; it came, as all others before this Congress, through the Commissioner of came, as all others octore this Congress, through the Commissioner of the General Land Office in this way: The people of New Mexico under the law of Congress were obliged to put their titles before the surveyor-general for examination; he was authorized to take testimony as to the nature and validity of the grants, the time of occupation, &c. Everything of that kind was adjudicated by the surveyor-general. I know that that officer was not regularly a court; but the Congress of the United States had invested him with the powers of a court in a certain sense so far as this question was concerned, and the people were compelled to submit to this procedure apparently irregular as it was. What does the gentleman from Texas mean when he says that this was a court which had no record, no jury, and no appellate tribunal?

Mr. REAGAN. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that under the law the surveyor-general did have appropriate func-tions to ascertain the facts and report them to Congress for its action. That was what I stated; and I stated further that there were no records, no jury, no authority to determine questions of title. I did not state what I state now, that any such action would have been null

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. Chairman, here was an act of Congress which said to the people of New Mexico, "You shall do so and so." The people, following that act, went before the surveyor-general.

The gentleman says that that officer had no records before him. Why, sir, the original grant made by Spain or Mexico and all the papers were before him. Witnesses as to occupation and extent were before him. before him. How could the question be determined unless the original grants were there?

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is no fault of the people of New Mexico or of these claimants that the Congress of the United States prescribed this method of proceeding. The gentleman may ask, Why did they not leave it to the courts? The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Hol-MAN,] not understanding the modus operandi, could not consistently with his nature, of course, do otherwise than object to this bill; but I am astonished that the gentleman from Texas failed to understand its provisions, and objects so earnestly. Possibly he might have understood that it was a court entitled to the same respect as any other court. But the Government of the United States took the cases out of court and compelled these people, against their will, to file their muniments of title with the surveyor-general and submit to his decision. In many cases, sir, he has rejected their claims.

Again, I wish to call the attention of the committee to another fact. Each one of these claims is reported upon evidence in print before Congress. The grant, the translation of the grant, the act of possession, the testimony of witnesses, is all printed and in the hands of the committee who reported this bill. It has been laid before Congress and is now in print before this very House. I hold in my hand two large volumes of this evidence. Here the original grants and testimony taken before are printed by the surveyor-general in pur-suance of law, and yet gentlemen get up and say they want to know about these claims; that they want to understand the vague and in-definite claims to these lands; that they want to know why and upon what ground the public lands should be given to these people! Gentlemen rise and talk about public lands and the giving away of

I know how sensitive we all are about giving away anything, and particularly about taking anything. [Laughter.] The gentleman wants to defeat this bill by asserting that it is the giving away of public lands. There is no public land in this case. The claimants here have been upon these lands, they and their ancestors, in some instances near three hundred years. It is giving nothing to them; it is giving nothing away on your part, for you never had it to give away. If you confirm these grants you merely carry out the sacred treaty obligations of the Government to these people; you merely fulfill the treaty stipulations made on the part of the United States with the republic of Mexico.

The gentleman makes the argument ad hominem that if you do this for the citizens of New Mexico, why do you not make the same grant to other Territories? It is unworthy of the gentleman from Texas, it is unworthy of such an able lawyer as he is, to talk about giving 49,000 acres to each of the citizens of other Territories. No one knows better than he that this is an unfair argument. It is giving nothing to the citizens of New Mexico, nothing more than what they are entitled to by right and justice and equity.

Mr. REAGAN. If we give these lands to New Mexico, is it not equitable and just that we should give like grants also to the other Territories '

Mr. ELKINS. No one wants to give anything belonging to the Government to these citizens of New Mexico. The Government never had any title to this land. It belonged to these people and has belonged to them and their ancestors for hundreds of years. They merely ask you to take the hands of the Government off so that they may remain in quiet possession of their lands. They are in posses

Mr. ELKINS. I will answer that as I have heretofore. The Government sends surveyors over these lands and subdivides them, and along comes some man who enters a pre-emption claim, and then of course there is conflict between the pre-emptor and the original grantee. These people have the fee-simple right to this land under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and no one knows it better than the gentleman from Texas. We solemnly stipulated in that treaty that these people should be protected in their property. They were protected under the very same treaty in California.

Now what is the history of this whole matter? Mr. Benjamin, who now resides in London, one of the ablest lawyers who ever held a seat in the United States Senate, was the first man who reported some of these cases. He reported favorably and they were confirmed. Mr. Orth, now our minister at Vienna, next made a report on some of these grants examined by the surveyor-general. Here is his report made to this House, and I wish to read a portion of it with the permission of the committee. He says:

mission of the committee. He says:

The bill herewith reported also provides for the issuing of a patent in each case. It is not assumed that a patent is at all necessary in order to confer or confirm title in these cases, for we are aware that our Supreme Court has decided that confirmation by act of Congress and approved survey under it are sufficient evidence of title without any patent; but we believe it due to these claimants, whose original title-papers have heretofore been surrendered to our Government, that they should not be put to the trouble of providing, each for himself or herself, a copy of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, of the act of Congress of July, 1854, of the act of Congress confirming such title and the survey under it, in order to feel assured that the lands which in some of these cases have been in the possession of these claimants or their ancestors for one hundred years is really their property.

I call the attention of the committee to this act of Congress. Every man who had a grant deposited his grant in the surveyor-general's office. There you have them all, and now you will not confirm the You compelled them to take to the surveyor-general their muniments of title; you heard witnesses; you passed some cases and you reject others; and now, when the cases which were reported favorably by the surveyor-general come up to Congress, there are gentlemen here ready to get up and talk about giving away the public domain. But let me continue the reading of Mr. Orth's report:

As American citizens they are entitled to a simpler evidence of title, and such as is given to our citizens who acquire real estate from the Government by the various modes provided by our laws.

In some of the acts heretofore passed in reference to lands under said treaty with Mexico patents have been required to be issued, while in others this has been overlooked; hence we provide furthermore in this bill that in all cases in which confirmation has been had without the issuing of any patent such patents shall be issued, thus placing all claims under said treaty upon an equal basis.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to answer while I am up on this occa-Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to answer while I am up on this occasion the gentleman from Indiana when he says that all the good titles have been long ago confirmed. That is a very broad statement. Any one can get up and talk that way, but such, sir, is not the case. The gentleman is mistaken. Cases have been reported and are being reported, and will be reported as long as this act of Congress is in existence, unless you repeal it or until all the grants are confirmed. It is only with the greatest difficulty you can get action on one of these cases. These fifty cases have been distributed over eight or ten years. They are now before this House, and just as might be expected, gen-

They are now before this House, and just as might be expected, gentlemen get up and object to their confirmation and say that you are robbing the Government of its lands!

Now, Mr. Chairman, I deny that all the good grants have been confirmed, or that all but vague and uncertain grants have been confirmed, as the gentleman states. That is not the case. Mr. Orth in his report and Mr. Benjamin in his report have stated that these lands, instead of belonging to the Government, have been in the possession of the claimants in some instances one hundred years before this nation care into every contract of them in their possession should the came into existence, and some of them in their possession about the came into existence, and some or them in their possession about the time the Pilgrims landed in New England. And such is the case with many of the grants in this bill. Yet the gentleman says are we going to give away the precious public domain? Why, sir, you never had this land to give away. And you lose not an inch of the public domain by passing this bill. You only comply with the treaty and do an act of simple justice.

The gentleman from Indiana and against to appeal to the sensitive.

do an act of simple justice.

The gentleman from Indiana endeavors to appeal to the sensitiveness of the House about the expense. The gentleman says, "O, the expense of this!" That is the gentleman's forte. Expense! And every time he can attack a bill on the ground of expense he thinks he can compel the House to follow him. And now, as the gentleman wants to maintain a consistent record, he must fight this, right or wants to maintain a consistent record, he must light this, right or wrong. He does not consider any rights in the parties for whom this bill is reported, but he gets up and says, "Here is some of the precious public treasure about to go, and although for a legitimate purpose, I must in being true to myself oppose it." I will say to the gentleman that when he is more sensitive as to the treaty obligations of the Government, and less sensitive in such a case as this about the publie Treasury, it will be better both for him and the honor of the Government of the United States.

Now these people, as I have said, have time and again asked the executive department of the Government that these lands should be surveyed at the expense of the Government. I do not know where surveyed at the expense of the Government. I do not know where the gentleman from Indiana was when this appropriation of $10,000 was got through last session. I suppose he was sick. [Laughter.] If the records are examined I am quite sure it will be found that he was not in the House on that day. If he had been, it never could have passed without the ever-constant and never-dying objection to expense. The gentleman never could have made such a mistake as being present and not objecting. It seems the gentleman must oppose everything, however right and proper it may be and no matter what committee reports it, if it involves expense. I have long watched his career, and while it may be worthy of commendation in some respects, I think it open to criticism in others. Constant negation is not the only element of a great stateman and the Government cannot be cononly element of a great statesman and the Government cannot be con-only element of a great statesman and the covernment cannot be conducted on the principle of negation.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman allude to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN?]

Mr. ELKINS. I have been making some reference to him, and I thought his photograph was sufficiently well drawn to be recognized.

Now there is another question. The gentleman from Indiana says: "Are you going to subdivide all these lands for these people?" The bill, Mr. Chairman, proposes a survey of the exterior boundaries to separate the Government land from this private land, and it is the separate the Government land from this private land, and it is the duty of the Government to do this. If a man owns property all around my property, as a matter of justice and right he should make the survey of the boundaries at his own expense. But here you have the treaty, which is a higher authority than any objection the gentleman can make, and higher than any act of Congress, which says that these people shall be protected. Now, what do you do? You compel the people to go before the surveyor-general to prove their titles at immense expense in the employment of counsel, the payment of witnesses' fees and all that and then you compel them to come nties at immense expense in the employment of counsel, the payment of witnesses' fees, and all that, and then you compel them to come to Congress to have their grants confirmed at the end of stubborn resistance, and after they are confirmed you say to them, "You shall pay for the survey of your own land, and tell the Government where its lands are situated." I say that this is against the common principles of justice and against the provisions of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, by which these people are protected in their land and by which they came into the United States.

The gentleman says that some of these lands are not in satural says that some of these lands are not in satural says that some of these lands are not in satural says that some of these lands are not in satural says that some of these lands are not in satural says that some of these lands are not in satural says.

The gentleman says that some of these lands are not in actual pos The gentleman says that some of these lands are not in actual possession of the grantees. The committee examined this question. It would have taken a bill as long as from here to Richmond, Virginia, to incorporate what the gentleman wanted. You must take some things for granted. The committee knew what they were doing when they reported this bill; and the gentleman ought to give some weight to their report, unless he wishes to brand the committee as incompetent or unfair. The committee had each case before them; the sureyor-general had each case before him; so had the Commissioner of the Land Office; and this is their report.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] says eleven leagues of land amount to 49,000 acres, and fifty claims of 49,000 acres each will cover nearly three millions of acres. I will answer the gentleman. Some of these claims, Mr. Chairman, amount to 2,000 acres; some to 5,000 acres; some to 30,000 acres or more; and in some instances there are as many as three hundred claimants or more in all of the original grantees and their descendants. The grant is sometimes to one man; sometimes to three, to five, to ten, and seventy men; and a whole county is sometimes located as colonization claims. This is the history of the transaction, and neither the gentleman from Texas nor the gentleman from Indiana can deny it.

Mr. Chairman, this may be voted down upon the declaration of the gentleman, with his wave of the hand, that it is not right, that it is wrong. But I warn you that if you do this you violate the treaty made by this Government with the government of Mexico. Now, I deny—and I do so for the information of the House and not with any bad feeling toward the gentleman from Texas—that there is anything here about inchoate titles. As I said before, I could read one of them for the satisfaction of the committee, if the committee had patience to listen to it. The gentleman ought to know that they are made by the legally constituted authorities, approved in most instances by the departmental assembly, and have all the formalities of law attaching to them. Why, then, does the gentleman talk about inchate titles and the Government giving away these lands? There is nothing in this position.

The gentleman says that the nature and extent of the lands are not known here. If he had read the executive documents in each case he would have found statements of the extent of the lands and how long the claimants had occupied them, as also the original grants, translations, and evidence in each case, all of which was before the committee and printed. If the gentleman from Indiana had been half as industrious to do that as to look after the Treasury and to object to everything, he might have arrived at a different conclusion. But I believe if the Lord's Prayer was incorporated in a bill or presented by itself the gentleman from Indiana would want it amended or sent to some committee or voted down entirely. There is no qu stion that he would do this in the minds of those who know him. [Great laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another question to which I wish to refer. I know I am trespassing upon the time of the House, but I must beg its further indulgence.

Several Members. Go on; go on.
Mr. COOK. I rise to a question of order. There is great confusion in the House from gentlemen crowding around the gentleman who is speaking. This is a matter of great interest, and the whole House ought to have an opportunity of hearing the gentleman who represents the Targit of the Targit of sents the Territory.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. ELKINS I speak fast on this subject and I speak earnestly.

I speak fast because I know how valuable the time of the House is, I speak fast because I know how valuable the time of the House is, and I speak earnestly because I know this is right, absolutely right, that these people have rights as a matter of justice, and rights covered by treaty and protected by laws of the United States. Now, if gentlemen will read the bill fairly, they will see that there is no cause for any difficulty about this. The gentleman from Indiana professes to appear as the champion of my people. He says, "If you confirm these grants a great many good people will be deprived of their homes." Now, it is in the interest of these people who own the lands that I want this bill passed, in order to settle the lines between Government lands and these grants. ernment lands and these grants.

Now, sir, this bill is drawn carefully. It provides that such confirmation shall only be construed as a quitclaim or relinquishment of all title or claim on the part of the United States to any of the lands embraced in either of the said claims, and shall not affect the adverse rights of any person or persons to the same or any part thereof.

What is meant by adverse claimants? Other people who may have an equal interest in the lands, so that if the claim is confirmed to one man and another claims it he can assert his right; this is a saving clause protecting the adverse claimants, and that is what it is put in the bill for.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] says that he has had thirty years' experience in connection with the land laws. I cannot measure years with the gentleman nor knowledge, but I can say that I have given some attention to the subject, and think I understand it, and I am willing, if any gentleman wants information, to be catechised to any extent and to any length.

Mr. RIDDLE. The law provided that the surveyor-general should ascertain the amount of land involved in these claims. I would ask the gentleman from New Mexico if the exact number of acres in each claim should not have been reported to Congress before Congress was called upon to confirm the titles?

Mr. ELKINS. I will answer the gentleman, and I am glad to answer all questions. One of the objects of this bill is to provide that the lands shall be surveyed, so as to ascertain the exact number of correction these claims.

acres in these claims.

Mr. RIDDLE. But should not the claims have been surveyed before being confirmed by Congress?

Mr. ELKINS. Well, if you were to make such a proposition as that, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] would be on his tiptoes to know why the Government was called upon to survey lands toes to know why the Government was called upon to survey lands which it has nothing to do with.

I will answer the gentleman from Tennessee and do it fairly. In the petition of the grantee in each there is an approximation to the number of acres. You should bear in mind that the Mexican government had no such regard for the public domain as we have. For the purpose of colonization they granted larger bodies of lands than are contained within the limits of some of your States. They did not grant them by acres, about which they knew nothing, but from the top of such a mountain to the borders of such a river, three, ten, twenty, or thirty miles, if you please, and whole colonies settled upon them. In this case the surveyor-general requires every man putting in a claim to state to the best of his knowledge the number of acres embraced in it.

Now, to make a preliminary survey would, in some cases, cost $500 or more, and we must add to that the expense to which claimants would be put in going several hundred miles to the nearest court and bringing his witnesses with him. Suppose a claimant makes a survey, and the Government, after that survey has been made at his survey, and the Government, after that survey has been made at his expense, sees fit not to confirm the lands he claims, but some other lands with a different area. I can assure you, sir, that the bill is carefully guarded, and I submit to the House that it is better to say that the Federal Government, with all its appliances and officers, shall survey the lands at its own expense and have control of the entire matter than the grantee. It may appear unfortunate, I know, that God Almighty did not create some other agency than weak humanity to expense a but you must submit to the existing status. manity to execute laws; but you must submit to the existing status, you must trust to men—officers and surveyors; and I submit to the House that until another agency can be constituted we must intrust the administration of laws to officers, taking all the risks as to their fidelity and honesty.

If there is anything wrong in this bill, anything that is not exactly glit, vote it down. I have used my best efforts as the representaright, vote it down. I have used my best efforts as the representative of the people of New Mexico to get action by Congress. You will not give us either a court or commission. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] would object that it would take money out of the Treasury. I introduced a bill here to confer jurisdiction in these cases on the district court of the United States, and I was met with the statement "O, no! we cannot trust the courts. We cannot go to the additional expense; it will not do," while the people there are proceeding under the law at the same time. Now what are you going to do! There are claimants holding private land claims in good faith which they and their ancestors have lived on for a hundred years or more. All they ask is that the Government shall withdraw from asserting any claim. But even after passing this law the Government will still have control of the matter down to the issuing of the patents. If any person, the Attorney-General or any other officer, says there has been fraud in a given case the claim can be set aside. The Government retains all the power in its own hands at every point in the proceeding, and certainly would not survey a grant by any other boundaries than those expressed in it.

Now, sir, as I said before, it is I know an inopportune time to talk to this House about anything relating to lands; and how easy it is for gentlemen to get up in this House and talk about "our lands," when these lands do not belong to the Government, and never did. Before you had a Government at all these lands were, and there was a title to them; and let me say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] that the papers in relation to these claims have not only been before the Commissioner of the Land Office in the Spanish language, but translated into English, and they are now before the House printed in both

Mr. REAGAN. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question. If it is necessary to redefine the boundaries of these land grants, why put into the bill a provision that the United States Government shall issue patents for them?

Mr. ELKINS. I will state some reasons. I state as a legal proposition that the title secured by confirmation by act of Congress is

Mr. SAYLER. I would ask the gentleman if the sole purpose of this bill is to restore to a few people in New Mexico legal titles to a body of land so enormous that this House can scarcely conceive of the extent of it, and to dispose of the equitable rights of every settler on the lands?

Mr. ELKINS. Not at all. Mr. SAYLER. It does confirm the title, and the Supreme Court Mr. SAYLER. of the United States has decided that an equitable title in a settler against a title confirmed by Congress is no title at all.

Mr. ELKINS. The gentleman cannot show any such decision. In respect to the public lands as settled by settlers the statement of the gentleman of the law is correct; but in respect to a Spanish or Mexican grant confirmed by Congress, it is not so.

Mr. SAYLER. These Spanish grants are generally surveyed in such manner as to cover about three or four times as much as they were originally intended to cover. As a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims of the last House, and as a member of the Committee on Public Lands of this House, I desire to say that there is no possible matter in which there is so much fraud as the manner in which these claims are made to extend from hill-top to valley, and from stream to stream, until they generally succeed in getting about three or four times as much within the limits of the Spanish grant as really belong to it. That is the reason why persons who hold these grants are so anxious that their titles shall be confirmed by Congress against the interests of the settlers who have gone in good faith upon these lands, recognized so long as the public lands of the United No question comes before the Committee on Public Lands oftener than questions such as this, and in my opinion this bill deserves serious consideration.

Mr. ELKINS. The gentleman has made a serious charge against the friends of this bill and against my people, and I will answer him. The people who have settled on these lands do not claim under the United States but under grants made by Spain and Mexico, and this bill saves the rights of all adverse claimants; it says so in terms. These are not like the public lands; the gentleman is entirely mistaken in that. I defy him to point to a decision, such as he has re-

Mr. REAGAN. Can the gentleman point to a decision that does not subordinate an inchoate title or equity to a grant made by the Government? I call the attention of every lawyer of this House to the fact that the unbroken line of decisions from the earliest date to this time has been as stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER,] and no distinction is made between Spanish and Mexican titles or any other. The Government reserves to itself the right, as all governments reserve to themselves the power, to control all equitable and inchoate titles, and a confirmation by Government of such a title settles the question against all others.

Mr. ELKINS. I think I have been very patient and indulgent to these gentlemen in answering their questions. The decision as stated by the gentleman is true as to the public lands. But the gentleman does not understand the question now before us. It is not that the These lands be-Government is called upon to grant public lands. These lands be-longed to these claimants before the Government had any jurisdiction there at all, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] ough, certainly to know that. The decision the gentleman quotes is not good law in this case.

I have trespassed upon the patience of the committee much longer than I expected, and I am greatly obliged for the attention which has been given me and for the questions put to me by gentlemen.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not heard all of this discussion. I would like to inquire what is the theory of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr.

Mr. ELKINS. As I understand it he says that these are not grants, but that we want to make them grants. He says they are incaoate titles, not absolute grants by the Spanish government. I say they are grants; the grants were before the committee, every one of them, and they are absolute in their terms, grants in fee-simple.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then it is a question of fact.

Mr. ELKINS. I can only give my word for it, and the word of the committee for it. You have heard the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. Joyce,] and the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. Buckner,] who is just as good a lawyer as any of those who oppose this bill. He has looked into this question and he knows what these grants are.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] if that is the issue between him and the gen-

Mr. GARTIELD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] if that is the issue between him and the gentleman from New Mexico, [Mr. ELKINS.]

Mr. REAGAN. Partly. I said that if these were perfect grants, there was no use for more legislation to make them perfect.

Mr. ELKINS. You have done so for twenty years in California; and hardly a week passes but what you do it in California.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman has reference to equities.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not speak about equities. One word more. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has tried to frighten us about mineral lands. Well, if the Spanish government gave the fee-simple title to a certain piece of ground, how are you going to get the minerals out of it after you have made this treaty? How will you take it away from the grantee? If the Spanish government owned this land and parted with the title to it, or if by the revolution of 1821 it became the property of the Mexican government and that government confirmed the grant, because the Mexican government became the successor to the Spanish government and ratified these grants, and being in fee-simple, of course they embraced all the minerals in the land. Why not? The Government is not robbed by that, nor injured in anywise; but to refuse to confirm these grants is an injusinjured in anywise; but to refuse to confirm these grants is an injustice to the grantees.

One word more. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] says that these grants may be extended so as to embrace three or four times as much as was originally intended. This cannot be, because they all have natural metes and bounds; and if the surveyors employed and paid by the Government do not survey them accordingly, whose fault is it? But should that prevent you from doing justice in this case?

You have your laws, and humanity is delegated to execute those laws. Now, Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee to the Louisiana purchase. Portions of the cities of Saint Louis, Carondelet, and other places are upon grants precisely similar to these, measured by arpents and leagues. Every member from Missouri and from Louisiana knows that grants of this kind are nothing new in those States. The case is the same with California and in part with Florida. Why should New Mexico be excepted from the operation of the same law

the same law?

To close what I have to say, the people of New Mexico have in good faith proceeded under the law of Congress; they have filed their titles, and those titles have been adjudged. As a matter of law, this question is res judicata. You have established your tribunal; you have fixed the time and place for the determination of these claims. All the people of New Mexico ask is that you shall carry out that act just as you told them you would. What objection is there to it?

I leave this question in the hands of the committee. I challenge the proof that there is one fraudulent claim included here. Most of the proof that there is one fraudment claim included here. Most of them are from one hundred to two hundred years old; some of them thirty and forty years; none less than that. As to the eleven-league clause, it was put in the bill to prevent claimants taking more land than they were entitled to. Prior to the colonization laws of 1824 Spain they were entitled to. Prior to the colonization laws of 1824 Spain and Mexico could and did grant any quantity of land to one or more persons. After that date, however, by law a limit was placed upon the power to grant, which was not more than eleven leagues in area should be given to one individual. This was the law.

Mr. HANCOCK obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. In order to test the sense of the committee upon this bill, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. HANCOCK. I believe I am recognized, and I do not yield to the gentleman from Indiana for that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from

Texas, [Mr. Hancock.]

Mr. Hancock.]

Mr. Hancock. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks in relation to the pending bill. I know very little more about it than my colleague, [Mr. Reagan,] who has spoken upon it; but taking the report of the committee as reliable in regard to the facts, (and I do not feel that I have any authority to question their veracity,) it seems to me there is really nothing in this bill that can be rightfully complained of. I do not know that the United States Government has pursued the wisest course in adjusting the rights of these parties as secured by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; but it is the course that has been adopted and acted on uniformly in all that portion of territory acquired from Mexico under the terms of that treaty.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Texas will yield, I will make a motion that the committee rise.

a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Chairman, if I yield for that motion, shall I be entitled to the floor when the Committee of the Whole resumes the consideration of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. When the House again goes into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, the gentleman from Texas will be entitled to the floor upon this bill. Mr. HANCOCK. Then I have no objection to yielding for the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If after the motion that the committee rise a motion should be made to strike out the enacting clause of this bill—which is the motion that the gentleman from Indiana indicates his desire to make—would not that motion, which is undebatable, take the gentleman from Texas off the floor?
The CHAIRMAN. According to the view of the Chair, the motion to rise in Committee of the Whole is equivalent to the motion to adjourn in the House.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. And the motion to strike out the enacting clause would not be in order pending the motion that the committee to conclude his speech before the floor is assigned to anybody else to move to strike out the enacting clause?

Mr. HOLMAN. I take it for granted that such is undoubtedly the parliamentary rule.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Texas yields for a motion that the committee rise, and that motion should be agreed to, he will be entitled to the remainder of his hour when the House again goes into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HANCOCK. That is all I wish. With that understanding I yield for the motion that the committee rise.

yield for the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. Holman having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had directed him to report, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 101) amendatory of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of James B. Armstrong, deceased," approved March 3, 1873; and also to report that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 344) to confirm certain private land claims in New Mexico, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HEIRS OF JAMES B. ARMSTRONG.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill reported from the crouse proceeded to the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, being a bill (H. R. No. 101) amendatory of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of James B. Armstrong, deceased," approved March 3, 1873.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The question being taken, there were ayes 70, noes not counted.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope it may be agreed to by unanimous consent to have a session to-morrow for debate only, no business to be transacted. Gentlemen can discuss whatever subject they please, including of course, if they so desire, the bill for the substitution of silver coin for fractional currency.

Mr. HARRISON. Before that is agreed to, I wish to say—
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent that a session be held to-morrow for debate only?

Mr. PAGE. I object.

Mr. HARRISON. In support of the objection made by the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE, I wish to say that it is deemed advisable the House should adjourn for a couple of days, in order to allow the cleaning of the flues that supply this Hall with air. This is a measure absolutely demanded for the sake of our health; and in order that it may be carried out, it is highly desirable we should not hold a session till Monday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is not agreed to.

ARMY TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. ODELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the contracts made by the Secretary of War in 1874 for the transportation of Army supplies from Chicago, Saint Louis, and New Orleans to the military posts in Texas, and ascertain whether the said contracts were awarded to the lowest bidders; and if not, whether the public interests were duly protected by the awards made.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Lane and Mr. Wigginton for one week each on account of sickness; to Mr. Tur-NEY for four days on account of important business; to Mr. Lord for one week on account of business which cannot be postponed; and to Mr. Sinnickson until Tuesday next on account of important business. And then, on motion of Mr. SPRINGER, (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BALLOU: The petition of P. G. Delany and others, of Rhode Island, for the release of Edward O. Condon from a British prison, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 20, 1876.

Prayer by Rev. H. E. NILES, of York, Pennsylvania. The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the Senate instructing the Secretary of the Treasury "to inquire and report how much more land on Fifteenth street will be required when the east front of the Treasury building is completed, and what will be the probable cost of the same, whether obtained at private sale or by condemnation for public use," transmitting a report of the Super-vising Architect of the Treasury; which, on motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the Senate of the 15th instant, the report of William G. Morris, special agent of the Treasury Department, on the Territory of Alaska and the collection of the customs revenues therein; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of Feburary 3, 1876, a copy of the report of Major William P. Craighill, Corps of Engineers, upon the present condition as respects safety and permanency of the Aqueduct bridge over the Potomac River at Georgetown, District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a communication from the Commissioner of Agriculture, transmitting additional information on the subject of "sea-island cotton;" which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that the Senate take up House bill No. 2262 establishing post-roads. I make the motion simply for the purpose of recommitting it to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, because I find upon investigation that several Senators who had certain suggestions to make and certain amendments to offer failed to present them, and I find by the rules at the present time that all such amendments must go to the committee before they can be considered. After the bill is taken up I will move to recommit it to the committee

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves to take up the bill and have it recommitted to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so should do, and indeed what I have resolved very often that I never would do, and that is to notice a matter in reference to my official conduct stated in the papers of the country. The circumstances, however, in this case are peculiar, and perhaps I am justified for that reason in making a departure from the rule which I had determined to observe.

On Thursday last, when I was confined in my house by indisposi-tion, the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Cameron,] the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. West,] and perhaps one or two other Senators, referred to an article which charged them in connection with me with having as their private secretaries persons who were employed in the several Departments. My colleague [Mr. Allison] at the time was kind enough, and for that I thank him, to make an emphatic denial of it so far as I was concerned. The matter having been thus referred to, it is perhaps due to myself, for the first time since I have been in the Senate, that I should say one word on the subject.

In the first place, I believe I have not been in the Indian Bureau for three years. As far as I know there is no person employed in any way in that Bureau whom I ever recommended. There is no person in the employ of that Department who does any work whatever for There is no person there who is my private secretary. mo private secretary now and never have had since I have been a member of the Senate; therefore I give to the statement an emphatic and unqualified denial. There could be nothing more false, more untrue, or more defamatory. The only person in the employ of the Government in any way connected with me is the clerk of the Committee on Claims, and how fathfully he discharges his duties I can appeal to every member of that committee without distinction of party. That is all I have to say on this subject so far as that statement is concerned.

I perhaps ought to notice another thing. There is a little paper, I believe, published in this city, which on the morning that these statements were made contained this article:

The New York Mercury charges that Senator Wuight, of Iowa, has a young man as his private secretary who is borne on the rolls of the Indian Bureau as clerk, but who performs no duty for Government except to draw his pay.

Why my friends who were charged in the other article were not why my hierarch who were charged in the other attere were not included in this I do not know. I suppose possibly it was because it was thought I was the only guilty one. I cannot very well imagine what else would have caused it. Whatever may be the motive, and I do not stop to inquire into it, I denounce it, whether in a paper of general or limited circulation in Washington City or elsewhere, as unqualifiedly false. As to the motive that may have inspired this article, I have none other than feelings of pity. I can only say, in common with other Senators on this subject, that if this malevolent, devilish, false, lying course is to be kept up, there is no safety for any man in this country so far as character is concerned, and the press becomes a disgrace to the country, to the age, and to our civilization.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. THURMAN. I present a petition very numerously signed by the inmates of the Soldiers' Home at Hampton, Virginia, praying that Congress may adopt such measures as may seem best to procure the release of Edward O'Meagher Condon, who is under sentence of imprisonment for life in a British prison. I explained the facts in this case when I presented a petition a few days ago on the same subject. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES presented a petition of the Boston Society of the Medand the Boston Society of the Medical Sciences, praying that, after some date to be fixed several years in advance, the metric standards in the office of weights and measures at Washington shall be the sole authorized public standards of weights and measures; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of merchants and business men in the city of Boston, praying that the bankrupt law may not be repealed, and asking an amendment of the same; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BAYARD presented the petition of Joseph H. Glatts and 192 other citizens of Delaware, praying for the continuance of the present law providing for the payment of pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BOGY presented the memorial of John A. Seudder and other steamboat men of Saint Louis, Missouri, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 373) to promote the efficiency of the light-house service; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce. Mr. KERNAN presented a petition of citizens of Flatbush, Long Island, praying for a reduction of the third-class mail matter to one cent for every two ounces; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WINDOM presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of Congress taking the steps necessary to obtain from the United States Government permission to make indemnity selections from lands known as salt-spring lands in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

was referred to the Committee on Funds.

Mr. ALLISON presented five petitions, signed by 493 citizens of Iowa, praying for an appropriation to complete the Fox River improvement and for the construction of a canal along the Wisconsin River from Portage City to Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin, in accordance with the third plan recommended by General Warren; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of the City of Dubuque, Iowa, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying for the establishment of a mail-route from Grant's Pass to Galice Creek, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying for the establishment of a mail-route from McMinnville, Yam Hill County, to Grand Ronde, Polk County, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. WHYTE presented the petition of William H. Shock and other chief engineers of the United States Navy who were fleet-engineers during the late war, praying to be awarded the same proportion of prize-money allowed to fleet-captains; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PADDOCK. I present a petition of numerous citizens of Nebraska, praying for the repeal of the law providing for the resumption of specie payments. I desire to state that I do not indorse the sentiment of the petition. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOOTH presented resolutions of the Legislature of California, in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Oakland, in the Bay of San Francisco; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of an appropriation by Congress for the purpose of erecting a light-house and fog-bell in the Straits of Carquinez, at or near Beniria or Martinez; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Henry A. Frink, late major of the Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, praying that he may be granted arrears of pension from August 15, 1865, the time of his discharge from service, to September 1, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ENGLISH presented the petition of the heirs of S. S. Hartshorn, praying for the extension of his letters-patent for an improvement in buckles; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the establishment of a tri-weekly mailroute from Waupaca, in the county of Waupaca, to Plainfield, in the county of Waushara; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of a consolidated official centennial directory of the general and several State governments of the United States of America; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a letter from the Secretary of State, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, inclosing amendments to sections 91 and 168 of the regulations of consular courts in Japan, proposed by Hon. John A. Bingham, the United States minister at Tokei; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a protest of Messrs. W. H. Parsons and J. C. Chew, United States Centennial commissioners from Texas, remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 1749, proposing to supersede them and appoint others in their stead; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RELIEF OF SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. WITHERS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for certain Indians, to report it with an amendment; and I am also instructed by the committee to ask for its present consideration.

its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $100,000 for the purpose of supplying the "Sioux Indians of different tribes, including the Santee Sioux of Nebraska," with necessary subsistence, namely, beef, bacon, flour, and corn, and for the necessary transportation thereof.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations with an amendment in line 7 after the word "hundred" and before "thousand" to insert the words "and fifty," so as to make the appropriation $150,000 $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.
The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 823) to correct an error of enrollment, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am also directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Henry M. Naglee, of California, praying to be remunerated for unused tax stamps destroyed by fire, to report it adversely and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. I invite the attention of the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to this case.

Mr. SARGENT. I suppose the case cannot go on the Calendar, as there is not a bill, but I am very sorry the committee have made an adverse report. I believe there are numerous precedents for such relief as this petitioner prays for. I would like to ask if the committee have considered the fact that this person being compelled by law to pay in advance for the stamps on the brandy, the stamps were unused, he proving that they were destroyed, and whether the Government of the stamps were unused. ment ought not in that case to make reparation, and give him relief? I ask if the committee have considered that point fully?

Mr. COCKRELL. I think the subject was fully considered, and the precedents all hunted up. I have no objection, if the Senator desires, that the report be placed on the table.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will not object, I ask that the petition be re-referred. I think I can hand some precedents to the committee that will cover the case.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from California to let the report go on the table and he can then examine it; and if he thinks there is any necessity for moving a re-reference to the committee, he can then do so.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well; I will let it take that course.

petition of General Naglee that I wish it may not be disposed of by being laid on the table.

TRANSPORTATION OF BONDED MERCHANDISE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 591.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 591) to regulate the transportation of bonded merchandise withdrawn from warehouse, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 3000 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to embrace all merchandise withdrawn from bonded warehouse at one port for transportation without payment of duties to another port by land or water, including all merchandise mentioned in the Revised Statutes of the United States from sections 2816 to 2831, inclusive. All such merchandise is to be delivered to and transported by common carriers, to be designated for this purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to or by none others; and such carriers are to be responsible to the United States as common carriers for the safe delivery of such merchandise to the collector or other chief officer of the customs at the port of its destination; and before any such carriers shall be permitted to transport any such merchandise they shall become bound to the United States in bonds of such form and amount, and with such conditions not inconsistent with law, and such security as the Secretary of the Treasury shall require. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish such rules and regulations not inconsistent with law for the due execution of the section of the Revised Statutes amended by the act as he may deem to be expedient and necessary; and no demand shall be made of the United States by reason of any loss incurred in the transportation of such goods.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would like to have the Senator from Ohio explain the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. In explanation I will read the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 5, 1876.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 5, 1876.

Sir: I have the honor to submit herewith for your consideration a draught of a bill to amend section 3000 of the Revised Statutes, so that merchandise may be transported thereunder over bonded routes from one port to another designated by law, as well as from district to district.

By section 9 of the act of March 28, 1834, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to establish such rules and regulations not inconsistent with law for the due execution of the act as he might deem to be expedient.

Under the authority so granted this Department, in its instructions of May 9, 1871, issued regulations providing that all transportation of dutiable merchandise in bond from one port to another port or place in the United States must be made either by sea-going vess-is registered or enrolled, entitled to the privileges of the coasting trade, or by common carriers designated for this purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, over duly constituted bonded lines and routes as provided for in said instructions. This section of the act of 1854, however, was omitted from the Revised Statutes; and it is therefore deemed necessary that there shall be additional legislation upon the subject, as suggested in the draught of the bill above referred to, which requires that measures shall be taken in regard to the bonding of routes similar to those provided for in case of the transportation of unappraised merchandise under section 2990 of the Revised Statutes, it being considered advisable that the regulations in regard to transportation in bond of appraised and unappraised merchandise should allow the transportation of both classes over routes bonded for either purpose.

The passage of the bill will aid in making uniform the transportation of dutiable merchandise in bond as well from port to port as from district to district, and for that and the other reason-stated it is recommended.

The inclosed copies of letters relating to the subject from the collectors of customs at Boston, Portland,

B. H. BRISTOW.

Hon. John Sherman, Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate, Capitol.

The Committee on Finance have examined the matter fully, and that there can be no reasonable objection to it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator allow me to inquire whether this bill relates to goods imported in bond transferred from one port to another within the limits of the United States exclusively?

Mr. SHERMAN. Exclusively so. Not only that, but as a matter of course goods must be taken from one port to another port in the United States; and one object of the bill is to enable the Government to carry from one port to another in the same district; for instance, to transfer from New York to Albany.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The bill has no relation to goods imported through the United States for export to another country.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not the slightest. An inquiry was sent to the Secretary of the Treasury by me, and his letters are published in the report, one of which I have just read, in which the subject is stated distinctly. The committee recommended to strike out the proviso, which we thought was rather indefinite, and gave rather too large a power, dispensing with the bond required by law in certain cases. on the whole we had better omit the proviso in the copy of the bill reported. I do not know whether the Secretary read the proviso which the committee recommend to be striken out.

Mr. CONKLING. There is no provise in the copy of the bill reported.
Mr. SHERMAN. Then the committee reported it without the proviso. The bill as framed in the Treasury Department had a proviso, which the committee struck out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was the bill reported to day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was taken from the Calendar on

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed. SIOUX RESERVATION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 590 providing for an agreement with the Sioux Nation in regard to a portion of their reservation, and for other purpose

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 4 of section 1 to strike out "three" and insert "five" before "persons;" and in line 6 to insert after "brigadier-general" the words "who shall be detailed for this serv-

That the President is authorized to appoint a commission consisting of five persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Army not of a lower rank than brigadier-general, who shall be detailed for this service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 5 of section 2 to strike out "6" and insert "7" after "70;" so as to read:

And after July 1, 1877, no money shall be expended for the subsistence of the Sioux Nation unless upon said conditions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to hear some explanation of the necessity of that amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee thought that it would be too soon to provide these conditions in an appropriation made for the current year beginning the 1st of July next, and therefore it would be better to postpone the time one year, or at least leave that discretionary. I think myself it would hardly be possible to bring about this condition by the 1st of July next, and the committee thought the time had better be postponed until the following fiscal year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So far as I am informed of the temper of these Indians, so far as any restriction of that kind is advisable at all, and so far as the necessity for any such restriction exists or is likely to exist, I am sure that it will occur during the coming summer if it ever occurs. The object of the restriction in the bill originally was to induce the Indians by the information that unless they yielded to what was an absolute necessity the appropriation which they have received, and which they have received in large amounts from the General Government, (receiving in the past few years between three and four millions of dollars over and above what was stipulated in their treaty,) would not be made. I am thoroughly satisfied that as a peace measure there is no better and stronger and surer policy to adopt; and I am as well satisfied that there is no occasion for any provision such as is proposed by the committee. There is no occasion of course for any stipulation in any bill in regard to an appropriation to be made next year, because we do not know that any such necessity may then exist; and if it does exist, the appropriation bill for that year will be the proper place, and that will be ample time for such a restriction. If there is any need of any restriction at all, it should apply to the coming summer, and I certainly see no reason for postponing the restriction.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, only one word. This subject was very carefully considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs. The plan is, as stated by the Senator from Nebraska, to send a commission into that country to negotiate with those Indians for a portion of their reservation, that portion which is generally called the Black Hills country. By the treaty of 1868 we agreed to clothe and to feed the Sioux Indians. The provision for clothing has not yet expired, but that for feeding has expired. Nevertheless we have gone on as a matter of necessity and have fed them for a year or two, although there was no treaty stipulation binding us to do it.

We thought in the Committee on Indian Affairs that, as there was a large population pouring into that country which would come in conflict with those Indians very soon, it was expedient, if possible, to avoid that conflict, and we thought by sending a commission there, headed by an officer of the Army of not lower grade than brigadier-general, with proper civilians, one of whom at least shall speak the Sioux language, so as to prevent their being imposed on by their in-terpreters, who are generally a pretty hard set of fellows, an arrange-ment could be made; but to effect that arrangement would be a slow proceeding, for the reason that the commission of last year, although well organized and well prosecuted, failed. While it is going on we thought it would be wiser to feed those Indians this summer, as has been the case heretofore, but to let them know that unless some arrangement be made they will not be fed for this year, but while this negotiation is going on it will be expedient to provide them with provisions.

I am satisfied myself that if we could annually avoid war with these Indian tribes by an expenditure of from $50,000 to $75,000, or even $100,000 say, it would be the best expenditure Congress could make, because a war with these Indians of a very few days would cost a great deal more money. We therefore thought in the committee that it was better not to refuse to feed them now and to feed them for this summer, and let the Indians know that unless some arrangement be made with them the feeding will not be continued hereafter.

It is very important, indeed, that some arrangement should be made. The Indians are now in the right; that is, the Black Hills country belongs to them by treaty stipulation, and the whites have no right to go there; yet they are going there in very large numbers, and it will inevitably lead to a conflict and to a war, and to very large expenditures on the part of the Government unless this be prevented. I am satisfied that it can be prevented by sending a commission there early, as soon as possible, and remaining there during the summer. I believe that portion of their country known as the Black Hills can be secured from them. It is, in point of fact, but a small proportion of that vast reservation; and to make that a success we thought, and I think also, that while the thing is going on the Indians should receive their rations, as they are now doing, although the treaty negotiated in 1868 has now expired, and it expired more than a year ago as far as the feeding is concerned. I therefore hope that the amendment as the feeding is concerned. I therefore hope that the amendment will be adopted. It was well considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs, well discussed. We obtained all the information from outsiders that we could get—men of reputation, men of character, men familiar with Indian affairs, and they all concur in this. I not only hope the amendment will be adopted, but I hope that the bill will nope the amendment will be adopted, but I hope that the bill will pass as the only way to avoid a conflict with these Indians.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How many square miles of territory are embraced in this provision to be given up by the Indians?

Mr. BOGY. The Indian reservation itself is a very extensive one; large enough for a State—very large. The country which we propose to take is that portion lying between the North Fork and the South Fork of the Cheyenne River, which form the main Cheyenne when they join together. It is but a small portion of their reservation, perhaps not one-fifth perhaps not one-fifth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How many square miles?

Mr. BOGY. I am not able to answer definitely, but the proportion is small. The reservation is very extensive, and the proportion to be taken is not very large.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the amount to be taken is about a thousand square miles.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hardly suppose there is much encouragement for opposing this bill in its main features or for attempting to amend for opposing this bill in its main features or for attempting to amend it. So far as my experience has gone in the Senate during the last five years, there has been a readiness to vote the largest sums or the smallest amounts and with the least consideration for anything connected remotely or directly with Indian matters; and therefore I expect that this Senate will vote any appropriation or any measure of this kind appropriating the largest sum which the committee has been able to suggest, and with the slighest restrictions or amendments. Still, Mr. President, representing as I do the people of the State more directly interested in preserving the peace with these Sioux Indians—more so than any other State certainly of this Union if not Indians-more so than any other State certainly of this Union, if not any Territory—believing as I do that the present condition of affairs out there imperils the peace of the Northwest, and believing as I do that appropriations of the most extravagant character have been made that appropriations of the most extravagant character have been made and are proposed now to be made, and believing further that this bill should be amended in some minor particulars, I propose to ask for amendments such as I have suggested, and to get a vote of the Senate specifically and definitely on those amendments.

So far as concerns the policy, the wisdom of sending another commission to the Sioux Indians, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Indian Africa who has reported this bill has not very honorable.

tee on Indian Affairs who has reported this bill has not vouchsafed any information specifically. Certainly the experience of the past summer in regard to commissions, if we are to govern ourselves by the light of experience, does not encourage us in the hope that any new commission will be any more successful. Two commissions, large and expensive, and costing I presume more than $100,000, were dispatched to these same Sioux people last summer, and we know the result. We know that the last commission were glad to be able to retire in good order, retire unharmed, from the last peace council with that tribe

Mr. BOGY. There was only one commission sent. Mr. HITCHCOCK. Two commissions.

Mr. BOGY. One to investigate and one to negotiate.

Mr. BOGY. One to investigate and one to negotiate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But neither of them was sent without the money of the people of this country, and a good deal of it, if the honorable Senator will undertake to count the cost. The honorable Senator says to-day that he thinks $50,000 or $100,000 is well spent if it preserves the peace. That is very true; but $50,000 or $100,000 is the veriest trifle compared with the millions past Congresses have appropriated to support these Indians. The very preamble of this bill, which has been struck out by the committee, states distinctly that $3,300,000 have been appropriated for these Sioux over and above the amounts which were stipulated by the treaty which this bill is designed to supplement.

We have this morning, within an hour, appropriated $150,000 to feed those same Sioux Indians; and I think before this Congress is reed those same Sioux Indians; and I think before this Congress is called upon to appropriate $70,000 more to send certain gentlemen who desire probably—because there are gentlemen who are very anxious to undertake this mission—to make a trip into this Sioux country, we should inquire into the necessity for this appropriation and into the policy and probability of such an appropriation accomplishing the purpose which is sought.

Mr. President there is a more or the many a late of the control of the purpose.

Mr. President, there is a man on the ground in the neighborhood to-day of these Sioux Indians better calculated, in my judgment, to make a treaty with them than any man or any set of men likely to be ap-pointed by the President or by anybody else to make a treaty. I mean General George H. Crook, who commands that department, a man who by his success in obtaining peace in Arizona several years ago deserves the confidence of the people of this country as an Indian peace-maker. He is there upon the ground to-day, there in the immediate vicinity of these Indians, and a simple resolution of this Congress would be quite sufficient to enable him to say everything to those Sioux Indians that it is necessary for this country to say, everything which will procure peace on their part if anything in mere words will procure peace. I believe that General Crook is the man who should be designated by resolution of this Congress as a commissioner, if you please, to make peace with these Sioux and to notify them that hereafter, not in 1877, not at some future time, which the Indians do not understand or will not understand or care for, but on the 1stday of next July, unless they will agree to these stipulations, the immense appropriations which Congress has made will cease. That I believe would be a proper peace measure; but I believe this is an expensive, useless, and extravagant waste of the people's money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee to strike out "six" and insert "seven."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 10; as follows:

33, nays 10; as 10110ws:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Christiancy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Ingalls, Johnston, Kernan, McCreery, McMillan, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Windom, and Withers—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cockrell, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Key, Merrimon, Paddock, Robertson, and Whyte—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bruce, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Eaton, Edmunds, English, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, McDonald, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Saulsbury, Sharon, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, West, and Wright—30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was to unite sections 4 and 5 as one section and modify the language, so as

SEC. 4. That such commissioners shall each receive $10 per day for their services while actually employed, and shall immediately enter upon their duties, and shall be authorized to employ a secretary, who shall be a stenographer, and also an interpreter, at a compensation not exceeding $7 per day each, and shall make full report to the President at as early a day as practicable, which report, together with any agreement made with said Indian Nation, shall be submitted to Congress for its approval; and such agreement, when so approved, and not before, shall be binding upon the United States and Sioux Nation.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the attention of the Senator from Iowa. As I heard the reading there is no limit to the time this commission may last.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no limit. It is not supposed they will occupy any longer time than will be absolutely necessary to perform the duties. I do not think any gentleman who will be appointed or who ought to be appointed on this commission will be anxious to remain there any longer than is actually necessary.

Mr. DAVIS. Nevertheless it may last for year Nevertheless it may last for years, as I understand. I would suggest to the Senator who has the bill in charge that we ought to limit it to some time, he knows best what time; if it is to this Congress, say so.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no objection to a limitation in point

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether it is the purpose of the committee to make this compensation, which is now under consideration, additional to the compensation that the persons who may be selected may already be re-ceiving in the service of the United States?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; it is intended that any person now in the service of the United States shall receive no compensation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the construction that will be put on this act, I suspect.

Mr. ALLISON. There is a law now, I believe—I cannot turn to it —which provides that no officer of the United States shall receive additional compensation for any service imposed on him, particularly

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is perfectly true; but, that being the law, when we pass a fresh one, which reads as this does, that you may select an officer of the Army, for instance by name, and that he shall receive $10 a day for his services under this act, it might raise a pretty serious question whether the new law does not mean what it says.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will suggest an amendment embodying that idea, there will be no objection. It was the intention of the committee that the military officer employed should receive no other compensation in addition to his pay as brigadier-general. After "military officer" say "who shall receive only his Army pay."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then suppose the President appoints the Secretary of the Interior for one. You want to have it apply to all officers hr. EDACHES. Then suppose the Freshent appoints the Sected tary of the Interior for one. You want to have it apply to all officers in the service of the United States.

Mr. WINDOM. A proviso will answer the purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. Any amendment the Senator from Vermont suggests on that point will be gladly accepted by the committee, I am

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will suggest such an amendment presently. I will not stop the progress of the bill at this moment.

The PRESIDENT pro 'empore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 4 of section [6] 5 to strike out "10" and insert "20," and at the end of the section to insert:

and the further sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated to make suitable provision to aid the said commission in the discharge of the duties required by this act, and said sums shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

So as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of War be required to furnish transportation, subsistence, and protection to the said commissioners during the discharge of their duties; and the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as compensation for said commissioners, secretary, and interpreter herein provided for and the incidental expenses thereof; and the further sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated to make suitable provision to aid the said commission in the discharge of the duties required by this act, and said sums shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Juverior. of the Interior.

Mr. HAMILTON. I would ask the Senator from Iowa if that is a corruption fund?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; it is not so intended.
Mr. HAMILTON. What is it for?
Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Texas will readily see that when this commission goes out to treat with these Indians they will very likely reply, "You are already occupying our territory; there are three or four or five or ten thousand white people now in the Black Hills in violation of treaty provision. Now, if you want to make an agreement with us for the future, what have you to offer to us for this trespass on our territory in the past?" The intention was to enable the commission to be able to say something to these Indians with reference to the present occupation of this Black Hills country by the

Mr. HAMILTON. From the way it was worded I supposed it was intended to bribe the chiefs by presents, &c. I would suggest to the Senator from Iowa that we have done enough already, pretty nearly, to destroy all confidence on the part of the Indians in anything that we may promise, seeing that they are now being trampled upon by, as the Senatorsays, three or four or five or ten thousand men whom he told us the other day the Government was not able to remove from the Black Hills. I want to know what confidence the Indians will have in another treaty that the Government of the United States may propose to them. They had some experience last summer; we sent out two commissions, I believe, and spent a good deal of money, right in the face, too, of the knowledge that the Indians would not listen to them, for they stated before they left the city of Washington that they would not consent to make the cession; but notwithstanding the Government made the experiment.

I suppose the object now is to try to conciliate the principal chiefs, to make another treaty under duress; to put the Indians under threats. to make another treaty under duress; to put the Indians under threats. I do not think it is a proper thing for the United States to do. Although these Indians are small compared with the United States; although they are contemptible in one sense of the word, yet they are human beings, and they have made solemn treaties with the United States. They have relied hitherto upon the candor and integrity of the United States. I think this whole bill as much as anything else says to them, "You cannot rely upon the Government of the United States in anything it says." Why, sir, look at it. On the face of it they are threatened, if they do not make this treaty under protest that they shall be starved out: and we are occupying all the protest, that they shall be starved out; and we are occupying all the valuable territory that they possess, pretty nearly the only territory out of which they can make a support at all. If the Senator from Iowa will say that this $50,000 is intended to enable the United States to remove our people from the Black Hills, I will vote for it; for that is exactly what the Government of the United States ought to do, and it ought to do it without any ceremony, before it undertakes to treat with the Indians.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to correct a misapprehension of the Senator from Texas as well as of one other Senator, and that is in reference to the conduct of the Government last year. There was but one commission sent out last year to treat with or make an agreement with these Sioux; and so far as the Government is concerned I can say to Senators that no money thus far has been expended for that say to Senators that no money thus far has been expended for that purpose. The gentlemen who went out there paid their own expenses, and they are told that no portion of those expenses can be re-imbursed until Congress passes a law authorizing it. Therefore it is within the province of the Senate to say whether or not any sum shall be expended for that commission that went out there last year; and so far as I am personally concerned, I am utterly indifferent as to what they

Now with reference to our obligations to these Sioux Indians, it is not proposed by this bill to interfere in the slightest degree with our treaty obligations except in so far as the public circumstances compel us to do so. It is impossible for the Government, except at a very large expense, to remove from the Black Hills the people who are going in there now by the thousand. Why? Because of the character of the country and because of the ease with which persons go in there with their teams and wagons. This bill contemplates that, instead of attempting to do that, we attempt to make a new bargain with these Indians in reference to that country. It is true we say to them in terms by the second section of the bill that if they do not agree to a reasonable bargain we will cease to support them from the Treasury of the United States, which we now do outside of and beyond any treaty stipulation that we have with them. We obligated ourselves under the treaty of 1868 to subsist these Indians for four years. That term expired in 1873. We are under no obligation now to subsist them that I know of by any treaty; but every Senator who has investigated the question knows perfectly well that these Indians cannot become self-supporting where they now are in any reasenable time; and therefore the alternative is presented to Congress either to subsist them or to starve them or to compel them by force of circumstances to raid upon the border settlements and to subsist themselves in that way.

This is the best adjustment that your Committee on Indian Affairs This is the best adjustment that your Committee on Indian Affairs could make in reference to this subject. I agree with the Senator from Texas that if it was practicable it would be better to remove the people who are now in the Black Hills from this reservation. They are there without authority of law, and in violation of law actually. They have no authority there. We solemnly set apart this region of country, including the Black Hills, for these Indians by the treaty of 1868; but people have gone in there, and it is a question of public policy with us whether or not we shall use the whole Army of the United States against our own citizens for the purpose of recovering this country because gold has been discovered there.

ering this country because gold has been discovered there.

Mr. MAXEY. I would ask the Senator from Iowa if he has any definite information as to the number of white people now in the Black Hills country?

Mr. ALLISON. I have no other information except what is derived from public statements; but from the best data I can reach I think there must be some three or four thousand people now there in the hills or going into the hills. Of course that number will be largely swelled as the spring opens.

Mr. MAXEY. I then ask the Senator whether any steps were taken by the United States Government, by its military authorities or other-wise, to prevent these men going and settling within the Black Hills country

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that an order was issued last year—
Mr. MAXEY. I am not speaking of any order; but was any physical force used to prevent it?

Mr. ALLISON. A portion of the Army was sent into the hills last year, and men were driven out or taken out, as the case might be;

but what is the use of employing an army for that purpose when there is a region of twelve hundred miles in extent over which it is perfectly possible to drive a wagon?

Mr. MAXEY. The purpose of this bill is, then, to negotiate whether these men are there rightfully or wrongfully, in view of the fact that three thousand or four thousand people are there; and the question is whether it is policy to negotiate for the purchase of the country from the Indians in order to make their settlement there a legal set-

Mr. ALLISON. That is the object of the bill, and it has no other object so far as I know.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The statement of the Senator from Iowa certainly presents a very extraordinary condition of things. Here is a reservation the property of these Indians and which the United States by treaty has guaranteed that they should possess without the intrusion of the whites into it; and our own citizens have been suffered to make an invasion to the extent of three thousand to four thousand it is said. I doubt very much whether there is half the number there, but the number up to five thousand or ten thousand would not be very material. Now, our citizens having against law and in known violation of the rights of these Indians invaded that country, and holding it, we are to step forward and in the face of that occupation tell these Indians, by a statute which ties up the authority of these commissioners to a particular form of treaty, that they must take that or take the consequences.

Now, Mr. President, is not that a very extraordinary attitude for the Government of the United States to assume? Is it not a confession that we either have not the power or have not the will to compel our own citizens to refrain from invading the rights of these savage and ignorant people that we have guaranteed they shall enjoy in safety and in peace? Is it not the first confession of the kind that we have undertaken to make by a solemn statute of the United States? Or, if not, is it not the last one that we ought to ever undertake to make? What becomes of what we call national honor, if that is not an obsolete term? What becomes of those provisions of the Constitution which require the Government of the United States to faithfully execute the laws, which include treaties? What becomes of the respect which these Indians or any others or any other nation can have for us if we calmly stand up and say in the face of the civilized world that, these being Indians and being within our power and not having the physical force to resist our invasions, we will with our eyes open allow our citizens to invade their country, and then tell them that we will do nothing about enforcing their rights and repressing our own citizens unless they will give us the very land that we have invaded and seized?

Mr. HOWE. Does the bill say that?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; it says that in substance and in effect.

Mr. HOWE. Where?

Mr. EDMUNDS. In every word of it from the beginning of the whereases to the end of the corruption amendment, as the Senator from Texas has very properly styled it. It is the whole spirit of the bill. The Indian Committee have not recommended anything else, and they have had it under consideration. They do not propose to recommend anything else. Some influence undoubtedly has been brought to bear on the executive department of the Government to persuade that to hold up the exercise of its duty in excluding invasions into that country until we resort to pressure to get possession of Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I was under the impression at first, as the Senator seems to be, and yet I could hardly think that impression was well founded, that the second section of this bill threatened to cut off appropriations which we are now bound to make, unless the Indians consented to the first section. If the Senator from Vermont knows how that is, I wish he would state. I can hardly suppose that that was the design of the committee, to say to these Indians that appropriations which by treaty the United States is bound to make and continue are to be cut off and refused unless they consent to what some Senator has called a new bargain. If the Senator from Vermont knows how that is, I wish he would enlighten me although other Senators. knows how that is, I wish he would enlighten me although other Senators may know exactly how it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have replied to the Senator from New York in replying to the Senator from Wisconsin. I say that you cannot make anything else out of this long statement in this bill except that we intend to have these Indians understand, and we intend to understand ourselves, that we are to take no step at all in the performance of our duty under the present treaty to relieve their country from this lawless invasion of gold-hunters, unless by providing that the Indians shall leave it upon terms which this statute says the commis-

Indians shall leave it upon terms which this statute says the commissioners may offer to them. If there is any other construction to be put upon it I should be glad to have it stated.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the Senator that, so far from that being the proper construction, the very reverse is the one the committee intended. We provide here distinctly in the second section that we will not appropriate for subsistence. The law does not require us to appropriate for subsistence, nor does the treaty. Now, we simply say by this bill, "We will make a bargain with you, if we can, for the purchase of the Black Hills; if we cannot, we will, as you say we shall, stand on the treaty of 1858;" and that is all we say. "We will abide by that treaty; but, if we abide by it, we shall ask you to abide by it." That is all there is of that. We are bound to do certain things under the treaty of 1858. This bill contemplates that all those things shall continue to be done from year to year as that all those things shall continue to be done from year to year as now provided by law; but we say, "We will do more than the treaty provides; we will subsist you, and do certain other things for you for ten years to come if you will give up this little patch of a reservation known as the Black Hills." That is all there is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ah, Mr. President, the Senator has most skillfully missed the point entirely. The proposition of this bill is to leave the citizens of the United States now being in the lawless possession of this country, (and it being our duty to keep them out of it and to take them out of it,) exactly where they are, without taking any step or making any provision to enable the President to take them out or perform that branch of the treaty at all. We have got to look at the fact as it exists in order to understand the true meaning and interpretation of the statute and what its scope is; and we must not, terpretation of the statute and what its scope is; and we must not, therefore, shut up our eyes to what the Senator has said in his opening remarks, that here is a great wrong already perpetrated. This very land that it is proposed to acquire by this statutory enactment, as it is called, is already in the possession of these invaders, and the Indians are excluded from it in violation of our treaty obligations, to our knowledge. Now, the statute begins with this existing state of facts. It does not propose either as a condition precedent or a condition precedent or a condition precedent or a condition of the statute of the statut facts. It does not propose either as a condition precedent or a condition subsequent, or in any other way, that any steps shall be taken to right this wrong; but, leaving it just where it stands, we are to authorize these commissioners to tell these Indians, "You shall give up this little patch of territory," comprising somewhere from five to seven thousand square miles, "you shall give up that territory, and you shall also agree that you will acquiesce in such methods as may you shall also agree that you will acquiesce in such methods as may hereafter be provided by law or adopted by the President to advance you in civilization and the means of self-support; that you must agree to. You shall put yourselves into our hands absolutely in respect to whatever method we may say is best for your civilization."

I have heard it often said that the best way to civilize an Indian is to cut his head off; and that seems to be the opinion of a good many people. At any rate, the two things which they are to do, outside of and independent of their present obligations, are, first, to give up their property to those invaders; secondly, they are to put themselves into our hands to take any methods respecting their conduct which we think will tend to their civilization at any time hereafter. Those are the two cardinal propositions contained in the first section as to what the Indians are to do. I say that a bill which takes the facts as they now stand, with this wrong now perpetrated upon them, and undertakes to say to them, "The conditions upon which you shall have support hereafter, although you are not entitled to it except so far as the treaty gives it to you—the conditions upon which we will do anything for you hereafter are that you shall give up this land do anything for you hereafter are that you shall give up this land and that you shall put yourselves into our hands; and, in order to do that, we will provide $50,000 to aid in the laudable enterprise."

Mr. President, the way to do justice to the white people of the United States is to do justice also to everybody else with whom they come in collision; and the way to get a treaty from these Indians, if these Black Hills are desirable, which I very much doubt—and I will hazard the prophecy that in twenty-four months from this time there will not be a white miner in the whole body of those hills working—the way to get instice and propriety out of these Indians is to ing—the way to get justice and propriety out of these Indians is to begin by giving them their rights, and then you stand in that attitude where you can appeal to them and say "It is best for you and for us to make a change in our arrangements." But what will the Indians say? It is proposed now to make a new bargain. What guarantee are they to have that we will stand by the new bargain any more than the old one? What guarantee are they to have that their property on the south side of the Cheyenne Fork, lying between that and the great overland route to the Pacific, will not be occupied by white invaders; and, if occupied by white invaders, that the United States instead of driving them out or keeping them out will say to the Indians again, "You must give up that land to these white invaders, and then we will feed you some more?" But how are the Indians to support themselves if you constantly strip them of their huntinggrounds and their places where there are timber and streams, and then continually say to them, "You must either take what we give you and give up your land, or take nothing at all?" We cannot stand upon any such ground as that, Mr. President; and any treaty, in my opinion, that is made upon the basis of this statute will turn out just as the last treaty has turned out, to be merely as paper, so far as it respects the disposition of white people who invade them if there is any motive, either of land speculation or of gold, or of settlement, or whatever, that will lead our citizens to go there. And why so? These four thousand citizens of the United States when they went there went with their eyes open; they have invaded this country where they have no right to be; and we, instead of saying "You must go out of there and then we will see what we can do for the Indians," blandly acquiesce in that wrongful occupation; and, therefore, the intruders will say by a just logic, "If the United States acquiesce in this invasion they will in the next one, and we can take any part of the Indian territory that seems advantageous to us, and feel sure, from what has taken place, that we shall be protected instead of resisted in undertaking to do it."

There are other objections to this bill which strike me, but I do not know that they will other Senators. By the Constitution the power to make treaties is alone in the President and the Senate, and we have always hitherto made treaties with Indian tribes respecting the acquisition of territory. It is proposed by this bill to make a treaty with these Indians by commissioners appointed under the authority of law and with the approval of Congress, and not the approval of the President and the Senate under the treaty-making power. Can we do that? I do not see upon what ground we can do it. One Senator will answer, I have heard it suggested, that this is not a treaty but an agreement. That is merely another name for the same thing. This is a class of subjects which, from the foundation of the Government down to a very recent period, has always been considered by the courts and by Congress to fall within what is called the treaty-making power. Mr. ALLISON.

We have a law now which prohibits the making of Mr. ALLISON. We have a law now which prohibits the making of treaties with Indians.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have a law, I know, that was passed under somewhat peculiar circumstances which prohibits us from making treaties with Indians; and I suppose we might have a law that would be just as good to prohibit us making further treaties or anything else with foreign nations, and we might have a law that prohibited the Senate from meeting or the President from sending messages to us; but it might turn out in the end that the Constitution was a higher law and that the rights of everybody under the treatymaking power must be guided by that and not by statutes. I think it would turn out so.

In short, Mr. President, although we have the law that the Senator from Iowa speaks of, I feel quite sure that the Constitution is still in force and that the treaty-making power does not reside in the Congress of the United States; and I am equally sure that this provision of this bill is to provide for a treaty and nothing else. You may call it a contract or agreement or arrangement or stipulation; you may exhaust the epithets of the lexicon, and you still have the substance of a treaty from the beginning to the end. The title of these Indians, which the courts have always decided was a good title to the extent of their occupation, and a title in this particular case which they obtained or rather had ratified to them by treaty, is now to be disposed of by an arrangement, if you call it that, a treaty in fact and in law I call it, which is to change the sovereignty and the jurisdiction of this territory, and all rights to it, from these Indians to the United States. I do not believe that a law of that kind is constitutional. I do not know that it will make any difference with these Indians, or with the white people who wish to invade their territory and hunt for gold They will stay there with this law; they will stay there without it, so long as they see that Congress, or a considerable portion of it, is willing that the thing should go on in that way, and leave them and the Indians to settle their own affairs.

But the Senator from Missouri goes further, and says that this is necessary bill, because it is going to save us a war; that there will be collisions in this Indian country unless we move with expedition and with diligence, and we shall be involved in a war. How are we to be involved in a war if citizens of the United States invade a country where they have no business to go, with arms in their hands, and undertake to dispossess the rightful inhabitants of it, and are resisted? Suppose the Indians in the spring make an assault upon the intrenched camps of the miners, and beat them, and drive them out, is there any duty on the part of the United States to step in and back the miners? The Senator has stated in substance that it is the duty of the United States to aid the Indians to expel the miners. How then are we to have a war? Does the Senator from Missouri believe that these four thousand have so great an idea of their strength that they would rethousand have so great an idea of their strength that they would resist the military of the United States in equal numbers or greater numbers, and that they are going to carry on a successful war against their own country in holding on by right or by wrong, holding on any way to these mines? I do not think that is so. Undoubtedly, if the thing goes on, these Indians will feel that these white men are violently intruding upon their territory, and will take the Indian means, and the civilized means, too, of expelling them, and that is by applying force. Whether when the force hearing the Indians will held to Whether when the force begins the Indians will hold to civilized methods with prisoners and captives, I do not know; I should rather doubt it; but these men have gone there with their eyes wide open. They have violated our laws and our honor, and have violated the rights of the Indians; and the redress that we propose by this bill to give is the redress of taking the land that has thus been captured for the time being by this invasion, upon terms which we lay down in advance the Indians must come to, or else we tell them that they shall have no further favor or assistance from us.

Mr. President, I do say that it appears to me that this is proceeding in a wrong way. Undoubtedly it is a troublesome subject. It would be desirable to deal with it in some way; but I should feel much more disposed to vote upon the subject in any form rather than this, that would look likely to accomplish a similar result; that is a negotiation. Whether the President of the United States has authority, without any law to authorize it, to appoint commissioners to negotiate any treaty, I do not know. It has sometimes been questioned; but I think I would vote with pleasure for a simple concurrent resolution if you please, or any appropriate measure, which would authorize the President to appoint commissioners to treat with these Indians, not upon terms presented in advance which cannot be changed, but according to his discretion and that of his agents who are employed to execute this duty. Then when the treaty should be reported for approval by the Senate, as I think the Constitution requires, (but I waive that for the moment,) we could agree to it or not agree to it, just as this bill provides. If we should simply resolve that the President of the United States be requested to enter into negotiations with these tribes of Sioux with a view to obtaining this described territory upon reasonable terms, stopping right there and let him se lect, as this bill authorizes him in terms, such number of commissioners as he pleases, being the general of the Army out there alone who has been spoken of by the Senator from Nebraska, or being a larger corps coming from the executive head of the Government, with an open authority, and not with a treaty made in advance to which the Indians must come word for word and letter for letter or it all falls, and try to see what they could do, I should be greatly in favor of it, and I would vote for it with pleasure. But to do this which on its face appears to me to acquiesce in the present wrongful condition of things, if it does not do more, and to hold out a declaration to these poor people that they must give up the land—not negotiate but give it up, because it is what is called a strict conference, there is no latitude left for anybody—and then put themselves into our hands in respect to civilization or else they shall have no more aid from us, it appears to me would work in exactly the opposite direction from what it is intended to do. Instead of their meeting such a proposition with favor even for consideration, they would say, "We have no faith in you at all; you are violating this treaty now; you do not take any steps to correct it; but you come here not for negotiation, but with the strict terms in your hands, and tell us we must do so, and so, and so, and so, or you will leave matters just as they are and will do no more for us in any way." I do not believe they will submit to that; it is not human nature; and certainly Indian human nature is not any more easily coerced than is civilized human nature. We all know that. On the other hand, if we were to send commissioners there simply empowered to treat, without undertaking to of it, and I would vote for it with pleasure. But to do this which sioners there simply empowered to treat, without undertaking to foreclose the subject of the method of treating or the exact boundary of the land they are asked to give up, I believe that something possibly might come out of it.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to ask a question. Have the Indians ever made any formal demand on the United States Government to secure the lawful possession of that country to them of which they have been unlawfully dispossessed by the whites?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know whether they have or not. lieve, according to the reports of the Indian agents, who are all the people with whom they can have any immediate communication, and who are the agents of the Government for Indian intercourse, they have bitterly complained of this invasion of their rights. I think my friend from Iowa supports me in this statement. So that in substance they have done all that you can expect people with as little civilization as they possess to do. That is to say, they have remonstrated with the diplomatic representatives of the United States, to use such a phrase, residing at their courts against this invasion of their territory, but of course that did no good.

Mr. MAXEY. As it is said that parties are unlawfully in possession, the question of right is to be looked into; and if possession is to be restored as it was, the point is whether a formal demand has been made or not for possession.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What would be tantamount to that has been done over and over again.

I come now, apologizing for occupying so much time, to the last

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Allow me to ask a question. Does the Senator know that these Indians are not now and never have been on the reservation that he talks so much about, and that they positively refused to go upon that reservation to live and are now living outside of the reservation and within the boundaries of the State of Nebraska?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, I do not know it, and in the next place, if the Senator will pardon me, I do not think that what the question implies is exactly correct. The Indians, under the treaty of 1868, having a vast reservation as is stated-that is, a very large tract of country which is their reservation proper-have also hunting rights which extend over, I believe, a part of the State of Nebraska and part of the Territories west of that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They have no hunting rights in the State of

Mr. EDMUNDS. They did have at one time.
Mr. HITCHCOCK. They yielded those rights; and they positively refused at the outset to go on the reservation, and they have never up to this day conceded that point.

Mr. PADDOCK. My colleague is slightly mistaken in reference to that. So much of the Indian right to hunt within the State of Nebraska was taken away as excluded them from that section of the State in which their reservations were not placed, west of a certain meridian, which I do not now remember, and to the south bank of the White River. That small section of the State, the northwest corner of the State still remains where agencies are located. That is all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But my colleague is well aware of the fact that this reservation never extended to Nebraska, and that they never had any right in Nebraska except the right to hunt over a portion of the any right in Nebraska except the right to nunt over a portion of the State, which right they have given up.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me to interrupt him, I think I can explain the matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am looking for information and getting it.

Mr. ALLISON. The southern boundary of this Sioux reservation is the north line of the State of Nebraska, as stated by the Senator from Nebraska; but, as I understand, the north line of the State of Nebraska was run after the treaty of 1838; and the Sioux Indians not being very familiar with narallels of latitude and meridians of longibeing very familiar with parallels of latitude and meridians of longitude, being rather more familiar with streams and water-lines, insist that the real boundary was in a portion of what is now called Ne-braska. That is a matter that they have constantly disputed; although by the terms of the treaty the southern line of their reservation is the northern line of the State of Nebraska. Therefore they are liter-ally now off their reservation, although they claim that they are on territory which was originally intended to be embraced within it by

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But at the time of their location they refused positively to go to the Missouri River, where they were expected and desired to go.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The treaty does not exactly require them to go to the Missouri River and stay there, but they agree to receive their supplies in the vicinity of the Missouri River; and the Senator says, undoubtedly correctly, for he is familiar with it, that they have not received their supplies there, but they have been delivered to them at the agencies in his State.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What I said was that their home, their agency buildings, their agency, never have been and are not on the reservation that is so much talked about. Much has been said about the rights of the Indians; but here is a treaty that the Indians made, and they positively at the outset refused to comply with it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That begs one question on which the Indian would probably like to be heard before we decide against him. When this treaty was made-Mr. HITCHCOCK.

So far as champions are concerned, they are

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So far as champions are concerned, they are very ably represented here, I am sure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very glad they are, and particularly by my friend from Nebraska. They are a part of his constituents, according to his statement, and he has a right to speak for them, and I have not in so intimate a sense as he. But what my friend has said involves one serious matter of right between the Indians and the United States. There may be Indian reservations within a State. There is nothing in the fact that Nebraska is a State that has anything to do with it that I know of. Her State sovereignty does not extend over them any more than the State sovereignty of New York does over the Senecas, if there are any of them left there. The Indians are Indians still, and the title of the State to the land they occupy does not depend upon the fact that she is a State, but it depends upon the fact that those lands have become the property of private citizens, deriving them from the United States, except in respect to the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections and so on, that are given to the States after the surveys. So, then, these Indians at the time this treaty was made lived chiefly or partly in what is now claimed to be a part of the State of Nebraska near its north line.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not at all. They moved into Nebraska after the treaty was make.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, put it that way, because the United States established their agency buildings on the north side of the White River, if that is the name of the river.

Mr. ALLISON. The south side.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The south side of the White River or wherever the United States put up their agency buildings, I suppose the Indians clustered around. But, Mr. President, supposing the Indians have not any rights at all where they now are in the State of Nebraska; suppose they occupy the same relation to the State of Nebraska in respect of a right to be there that these miners do in their reservation, how does that help it? Does one wrong right another? But the Senator has not shown us that there is any wrong in the Indians being there, unless they are there in violation of the treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is precisely what I have been saying and

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator read the clause of the treaty then?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The clause of the treaty? I will read the description of the reservation:

Commencing on the east bank of the Missouri River where the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude crosses the same; thence along low-water mark down said east bank to a point opposite where the northern line of the State of Nebraska strikes the river; thence west across said river and along the northern line of Nebraska to the one hundred and fourth degree of longitude west from Greenwich; thence north on said meridian to a point where the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude intercepts the same; thence due east along said parallel to the place of beginning.

Showing that the north line of Nebraska was the south line of the Indian reservation.

Mr. EDMUNDS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is perfectly clear; but that does not prove that the Indian ought to be deprived of his property because he is on the south side of his reservation. If he is not violating anybody's rights, if he is on the public lands of the United States that is not occupied, I do not know any reason why he has not just as good a right to be there as I have.

Mr. PADDOCK. Allow me to state that he is upon just that territory into which he was permitted to go under treaty to hunt. The Indian, in his interpretation of treaties, makes no distinction between a reservation and that section of country into which he is permitted to go to hunt. He therefore considers himself to be there rightfully.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Do you think so?

Mr. PADDOCK. Undoubtedly. Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Nebraska on the right [Mr. PAD-Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Nebraska on the right [Mr. PAD-DOCK] has stated the case, as he always does, with great clearness, so that I understand it perfectly; but I am putting it now on the ground taken by my friend on my left, [Mr. HITCHCOCK,] and I am seeing how it will be supposing he is perfectly right in his doctrine that these Indians are outside of their reservation in the sense of being on the reservation they are not on it, and are therefore wrong. But does it follow that these Indians are committing any wrong upon any body, or violating any treaty, because having a reservation they have chosen to leave its limits and to set up a wigwam upon some public territory of the United States that is not occupied by anybody in territory of the United States that is not occupied by anybody in advance? Why has not an Indian just as good a right to put up a cabin on unoccupied land of the United States as a miner has? I do oath on unoccupied tand of the United States as a miner has. I do not know any reason. I cannot think of any reason.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He is not a citizen.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose he is not; suppose he is an alien or an outlaw, a man under disabilities, he still has a right to be somewhere, and he does not violate any law by setting up his wigwam in the vicinity of buffalo ranges along the White River, where he can hunt conveniently. But as the Senator from Nebraska has stated the case, it is unnecessary to debate that question, because it is not the question. These Indians have a right to hunt in the country where they are now located, taking the phrase of my friend from Nebraska on the other side of the Chamber, and they cannot hunt there without being there; and there is nothing in the treaty which says that they shall only hunt one week in the year that I know of. They must subsist, except so far as we subsist them; and when you come to that, it is not altgether clear to my mind that these Indians have received by way of subsistence any more than we agreed to pay them. It is true that we have made appropriations for one or two years since the time we bound ourselves to make them; but whether it be true that these Indians have, taking it altogether from the making of the treaty to this time, actually received what they were entitled to, after the property and the blankets and the supplies have gone through the strainers of the Departments, contractors, transporters, and Indian agents, is quite another question. I rather think if we could have a bill in equity, and an inquiry and an examination before a master, we should find that on the general average we have not yet actually we should find that on the general average we have not yet actually put into the hands of these savages any more property than they were entitled to have under the treaty.

Mr. MORTON. I agreed with the Senator from Iowa to let this bill run a little while, concluding that it would soon pass. I am satisfied now that the discussion will be continued. I must therefore call for the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will let me speak one minute longer

Mr. MORTON. I thought the Senator was through.
Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not take more than a minute longer.
Mr. PADDOCK. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me a word? Mr. President, in relation to the subject of supplies under the

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. EDMUNDS. For a moment.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana has called for the unfinished business.

Mr. EDMUNDS.

But he has yielded to me.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to say that from the outset the Indians themselves did not comply with the requirements of the treaty in respect to the matter of subsistence. The treaty required that the provisions, blankets, &c., should be delivered to each Indian. They were to be delivered to the Indians individually. In order to make were to be derivered to the Indians individually. In order to make that possible it was necessary that the Indians themselves should submit to an enumeration. That, from the commencement of the performance under the treaty until the day that they ceased to be fed under the four-year term, they always persistently refused to do. In that respect they violated the treaty. So it is impossible to tell whether they did receive so much as they should have received or whether there were always or not in respect to the treaty.

whether there were abuses or not in respect to that matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be true. That was not the part of the matter that I was alluding to. If they have not got as many blankets as they might have received if they had submitted to be counted, it is their own fault, and we have not had to give them blankets to that extent; but, although that was a violation of the treaty, like the waiver of a privilege that they have, they could not have their blankets until they came for them and were counted; and if they did not come and were not counted, they did not get them; that would not make any difference on this question. What I alluded to was what we have a pretty general understanding of, that in the distribution of goods there are many things done which ought not to be done

Mr. PADDOCK. I admit that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A single word more. The last amendment of the committee I wish to call the attention of the Senate to, which provides that the further sum of $50,000 is appropriated "to make suitable provision to aid the said commission in the discharge of the duties required by this act." It has been suggested that that had reference to getting rid of the miners and persuading them to be still or to go out so that the Indians could treat on fair terms in possession of their country again; but it does not say that. It is "to aid the commission in the discharge of the duties required by this act." Those duties are to say, first, to the Indians that they must give up this Black Hills country and, second, that they must put themselves into our hands for civilization and, third, that if they will do that they shall have appropriations for ten years. This money, therefore, in its expenditure is confined exclusively to aiding these commissioners in doing what they are to do, and that is to get the Indians to agree to these particular terms. I hope that the Senate will not adopt it, because we cannot disguise it from ourselves that it is like aid that is granted to commissioners making secret treaties with other powers, as has been done in the course of civilization a good many times for the purpose of dealing with the chief men of civilized as well as savage natious, by way of pecuniary inducements and benefits, to get them to do something which they otherwise would not do in surrendering the rights of their people.

them to do something which they otherwise would not do in surrendering the rights of their people.

Expressing my thanks to my friend from Indiana, I conclude.

Mr. MORTON. I now ask for the regular order.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to be allowed to offer an amendment, which I wish to have read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment suggested will lie on the table and account.

the table and be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read if there be no objection

Mr. MERRIMON. I want to say in candor that I am opposed to this bill out and out

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remind the Senator from North Carolina that the morning hour having expired, and the Senator from Indiana having called for the consideration of the unfinished business, it is out of order except by consent of the Senate.

Mr. MERRIMON. So I understood, but he yielded to me for a moment. I will take but a moment. I said that it was due to candor to say that I was opposed to this bill; but if it is to pass I think it important that certain amendments should be made. I offer this one now and shall offer others, if it is to pass, to make the whole bill har-now and shall ofter others, it it is to pass, to make the whole bill harmonious with this. I move to strike out—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is not in order now.

Mr. MERRIMON. I want it read for information. I propose to strike out all after the word "that," in line 3 down to the word Sioux" in line 9 of section 1, and substitute what I have sent to the desk, and I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the words proposed to be inserted by the Senator from North Carolina will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out all after the word "that," in line 3 of section 1 down to the word "Sioux" in line 9, and substitute for the words stricken out the following:

That the President is hereby authorized to detail for the service herein provided for five officers of 'he Army not below the rank of colonel, who shall compose a commission whose duty it shall be to visit the various tribes of the Sioux Indians.

The proposed amendment was ordered to lie on the table, and be

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, under the rules of the Senate the amendment I propose to the pending bill will not be strictly in order until a vote has been taken upon the question before us. What that vote shall be may depend upon the existence of some better plan than any now under consideration, and I therefore beg to speak to the subject for a few moments.

The committee's bill has in view the passage of a law under which the electoral vote of States shall be counted.

Debate has elicited these facts: That as to this important subject there is a vital omission in the organic law; that for many years there has been in force as a remedy for the defect a joint rule of Congress. That rule, now abrogated, is admitted on all sides to have been iniquitous in conception, dangerous in existence, and constitutionally without warrant. With its paternity denied by all and its abrogation delayed by none, it seems to have been a political bastard, whose usefulness was contingent upon a partisan emergency and whose life closed with the first dawn of purer public sentiment.

The debate also discloses this remaining fact: That, agreed as we are as to the necessity of some new and equitable law which shall cover all contingencies likely to arise in the selection of a President and Vice-President, we are at great variance as to a remedial mode, comprehensive in its character and within our power to adopt.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections present their remedy in the pending bill; to it several amendments are offered, among them one of my own. Before presenting reasons in favor of this amendment I desire to state my objections to the committee's proposition, as well as to some of the amendments thereto.

The original bill fails in its purpose, confessedly so, in contingencies likely to arise, that have arisen heretofore. It is imperfect because it leaves the count of the electoral vote of a State entirely dependent upon the concurrent vote of both Houses of Congress. Should pendent upon the concurrent vote of both Houses of Congress. Should a State be so unfortunate as to have two sets of electors returned, and fail to convince both Houses of Congress as to which the true ones are, then its electoral vote is thrown out, its people wholly disfranchised. A large majority of the House of Representatives, for instance, might declare in favor of one set of returns; in the Senate all but one vote necessary to a majority might concur therein; yet this lacking vote, representing at best but half a State, and in fact but an individual opinion, would suffice to reject the electoral vote of a State.

Clearly it was not within the nurses of the fothers to give any

Clearly it was not within the purpose of the fathers to give any such extraordinary power to an individual over the people of a State, and that in deciding a question not judicial but political in its char-

There has been a general expression that the functions of members of both Houses of Congress are largely, if not altogether, ministerial as to the count of the electoral vote. The Constitution could scarcely have contemplated the almost instant transformation of a mere ministerial agent to that of a supreme judicial officer from whose flat no appeal could be taken.

The original bill fails in comprehensiveness. Its fault is that of omission.

The second section reads thus:

SEC. 2. That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Sec. 2. That it more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

Simply stated, the bill provides for the count of each undisputed electoral vote. In case of dispute as to the true returns of any State two hours only are allowed for reconciling the conflicting views of the Senate and House. Even this brief time is consumed in separate session; and, failing to agree, the electoral vote of the State is wholly

The disfranchisement of a people may thus hinge upon two quite possible contingencies: First, the easily procured and presented bogus returns so called from a State; next, the virtue of one or the other of the great political parties, tested under the greatest temptation.

Practically the committee's bill gives to Congress a veto power upon the acts of States

The danger of adopting the second section of the pending bill can be briefly illustrated by taking the case of Louisiana.

Should that State return two sets of electors and the vote of one or the other set be sufficient to determine the political ascendency of one or the other of the parties, in the administration of Federal affairs, is it probable the Senate and House would agree as to which were the true returns? No. Then the vote of Louisiana would be rejected.

true returns? No. Then the vote of Louisiana would be rejected.

This might leave the remaining three hundred and sixty-two votes standing as follows:

This would insure a democratic President and Vice-President. Yet to the people of the country it might be made palpable that the rejection of Louisiana by a democratic House was a partisan action and to defeat, as it only could defeat, the election of a republican President, as the count of Louisiana's vote would do. I choose this illustration, that is hypothetically against my own party, to strengthen its force with my republican friends.

Aside from this narrow and partisan result there is an objection Aside from this narrow and partisan result there is an objection broader and deeper. It consists in the crime of deliberately disfranchising the people of a State—in the enormity of excluding one of our own—not because her rights are not equal, but because we have not patriotism, patience, and virtue enough to defend them. Yet this defense is one of, and perhaps the greatest of, our mutual obligations as States to each other. It is the keystone guarantee of the Federal compact. No, Mr. President, Congress has no right—never had, and never will have, if justice is to prevail—to disfranchise the people of any State. The admission of such power is fraught with danger to liberty itself. Peculiarly as to this matter the States stand as peers, nor erty itself. Peculiarly as to this matter the States stand as peers, nor can we, their servants in Congress, infringe the rights of the weakest of them.

Sir, it has been intimated at least that the rejection of contested electoral votes would be no fault of the Congress nor of the people of the uncontested States. This is not true. There is just as much power in Congress under the Constitution to assure the full vote of every State as to assure that of one. If we can provide by law for doing anything, (beyond the plain, though admitted imperfect, provisions of the Constitution,) we can provide for all contingencies foreseen as possible. Our duty, sir, is to leave no chance for injustice, no invitation to fraud.

The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper] proceeds upon the theory of the constitutional provision regulating the selection of a President and Vice-President when no choice has been made by the electors. The theory seems to me to fail when applied to an equitable adjustment of the difficulty now under consideration.

to an equitable adjustment of the difficulty now under consideration.

The electors referred to in the Constitution were to be persons chosen by the State Legislatures—not by the people. They were to be an intermediate body between the States—not the people—and the executive officers selected. Their selection of proper officials was not expected to be controlled by party conventions, as has turned onto be the fact. It was anticipated they might differ in judgment to such degree as to leave no one person with a majority vote.

So plain is this anticipation that the Constitution provides that only three of all the persons voted for by State electors should be subsequently considered.

The electoral vote is a secret one. The power once exercised in

The electoral vote is a secret one. The power, once exercised, is ended. Thus the necessity for another tribunal, another electoral college substantially, in a contingency possible. That final tribunal, as we all know, is the House of Representatives; but only in the emergency named.

The whole of this residuary power of the House of Representatives proceeds upon the theory of a want of sufficient agreement between the agents or electors of all the States; not between people of the same State. The principle that lodged the first-named power in the No such principle applies in the adjustment of differences arising within a State. House of Representatives was that of protection to the smaller States.

The constitutional provision referred to is a remedy for what might otherwise be a fatal defect. It points to the legislative power, or a portion of it, as the proper power to decide who the Executive shall be in grave emergencies. In this view it is just now very suggestive. But it seems to me no more.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, to my mind, renders possible the selection of an Executive against whom the popular vote has been largely cast. It is no fair reply that this possibility already exists in another emergency. There should be no additional crevice through which the will of the majority of the people can be defeated.

ple can be defeated.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Johnston] proceeds upon the power of the two Houses to come together in joint meeting, and when together to act as a unit in Legislation. This power, in Congress, is not generally admitted. Its exercise, if constitutional, is hazardous and the line that most old-fashioned democrats deem as indispensable to true constitutional government is badly weakened by his plan, if not, for a period, absolutely lost sight of. I think the Senator will, upon reflection, agree with me that the actual amalgamation of the votes of the two Houses by meeting in joint convention is open to objection.

The amendment proposed by my colleague in substance provides for a court composed of the Chief Justice, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Though he does not say so in words, his amendment would seem to imply a lack of power in Congress to do that which it gives authority to its agent to do; or, if I am wrong in this construction, then it doubts the fitness of Congress to decide a question "partly judicial, partly political." Yet, Mr. President, it is just such questions this body, at least, is often called upon to decide.

But there is another objection to the amendment of my colleague that I deem fatal. This relates to the persons constituting the final tribunal named by him. The Chief Justice or senior justice holds his appointment from the President; not infrequently, as re-elections of Presidents occur, from the person to whom he owes his original elevation and upon whose continuance in the presidential office, as a matter of fact, he is called upon to decide. However just and honest his vote, this high judicial officer would stand in imminent danger of being questioned as to motive, and thus of losing his indispensable judicial influence. No part of the Supreme Court can be brought to the decison of a question that plain people would ever consider purely political without lowering public respect for that great and final tri-

Mr. President, I have proposed to add a new section to the bill now being considered, which I will thank the Clerk, if he has the amend-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from New Jersey will be read. The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. Should the two Houses of Congress, acting separately, fail to agree as to which is the true and valid return of a State, then, and in that event only, the President of the Senate shall render a decision of the question, and such rendition shall be in favor of that return of a State which shall have received a majority of all the votes cast in both Houses of Congress, considered as if both Houses had cast their votes in joint meeting assembled.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Now, Mr. President, I hope it will be plainly seen that the adoption of this or a kindred section leaves no pretext for omitting the count of every electoral vote of all the States

The Houses of Congress, acting separately, failing to agree as to which the true returns of a State are, join in effect the aggregate vote of both, and those returns which shall have received a majority of all the votes of the members of both Houses are declared the true returns. The duty of making this declaration is put upon the President of the Senate. The decision is final; the case is ended. This plan has some affinity with parts of both of those suggested in the amendments made by the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Virginia. Through the votes of Senators the States, as such, are directly had. By the votes of members the people speak through their more immediate Representatives. Their is no exclusion of either voice. The larger States make their power felt through their greater number of Representatives; the smaller States assert their equal voice in the votes of their Senators.

It may be said that the voice of States is liable to be lost under my amendment. This may sometimes occur. Yet at all times the plan suggested by me is an important gain of power to the smaller States, as against relegating the decision of the question to the House of Representatives alone. Another view of the matter will disclose this fact. Under my plan the practical decision of the question may often rest with the States through the votes of Senators. Should the House of Representatives be about evenly divided, as is frequently the case, then the Senate, usually very unevenly divided politically, would have the controlling vote. In a word, the opportunities would be quite evenly divided as to whether the decision would be reached by the controlling vote of the Senate or the House.

So, Mr. President, the amendment proposed seems to be as reasonably free from objection as any we are likely to adopt. Undoubtedly the wiser and safer plan would be to amend the Federal Constitution in such manner as to render the disfranchisement of the people of any State impossible. Meantime our duty is to provide the best system we can. That which I have proposed may be more objectionable under the light of full discussion than it now appears. It seeks no party advantage. It is in practice familiar to the people of all the States through the results of State legislative joint meetings. no small sanction from Congress itself since the passage of the law regulating the election of United States Senators. That law, it will be recollected, had for its object, almost its sole object at the time of its passage, the compulsory decision of a grave question, the selection of members of this body. The mode concluded upon as just and equitable was that of compulsory joint meeting when separate branches of a State Legislature would not or could not agree. I propose to apply to ourselves the same remedy for honest differences or factious opposition that we have assured the State governments was good for them.

Mr. President, I ought to say in justice to myself that I have not been able to give that full consideration to my own amendment which I had hoped to be able to do, and it is only within the last three or four hours that I have been able to touch it at all. I submit the suggestions I have made in the earnest hope that they may to some extent lead to a true and legitimate determination of this important, if not the most important, question now before Congress.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I should not attempt so soon again to make any remarks in the Senate upon this subject were it not that it strikes me the Senate ought first to be brought to the conclusion whether this power, about which so much discussion is now being had, is not lodged with the President of the Senate, as I suggested when making the remarks I did last Monday to the Senate. If that power is lodged now with the President of the Senate, then it is idle for us to waste time in statute legislation; but it is the duty of Congress, in case we have discovered an omission, to provide for contested elections, or, in case the power is doubtful as regards the President of the Senate, to propose an amendment to the Constitution; and therefore the preliminary inquiry is whether or not a constitutional amendment is necessary. That having been concluded, then what shall be the character of that constitutional amendment?

There is a vast difference between the ministerial duty of the President of the Senate, as I maintained the other day, in counting the electoral returns, and granting a prima facie case to an officer, and the examination of the right of that officer to hold the place in the case of a contest whether as regards the electoral vote of a specific State or in regard to the aggregate votes of all the States. Therefore, whether in regard to the count there is an omission or not, it is clear that there is no provision of the Constitution for the case of a contested election of President or Vice-President before the people. Hence it is important, if we mean to make any provision in regard to the count of the vote, that we should go a step further and pro-vide for a contested election of President and Vice-President of the United States. I say that it is essential for us now to amend the Constitution, for, after reading the able arguments of the Senators on this floor on last Thursday, I have seen nothing to change the view which I had the honor to present to the Senate on Monday of last week. On the contrary, a close examination of the question and mature reflection not only satisfy me in regard to that view of the case as presented by my own reading of the Constitution, but I do not think the precedent established when the Constitution was set in motion can be "whistled down the wind" as it was by my friend the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Thurman.] No, Mr. President, let us look at the point for a moment, and I shall not occupy the Senate long; let us look at the property of the preparation of the Senate long; let us look at the proposition as I presented it to the Senate upon that occasion.

The Senator from Ohio speaks of the precedent in the count. I did not call the attention of the Senate to the precedent in that respect; I called the attention of the Senate to what the convention that framed the Constitution, to what the men who were the makers of the Constitution asked the First Congress to do, and then followed it up by the precedent established by the first Congress that assembled under the Constitution. I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that, in the resolution which sent the Constitution to the Congress of the confederation and requested its delivery to the people of the States for ratification, the express language was:

That the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President.

That was his duty, to receive, to open, and to count the votes. That resolution went with the Constitution to the Congress of the Confederation; that Congress sent the Constitution, with this resolution, with the report of the committee, to the people of the States to be ratified by the people of the States. The people of nine States ratified it. Congress met under it; and, when Congress met what was the action of Congress? Its action was to elect a President of the Senate in the very words of this resolution, complying literally with it; the Senate of the First Congress elected John Langdon, one of the Senators from the State of New Hampshire, President of the Senate, senators from the State of New Hampstire, President of the Senate, "for the sole purpose of opening and counting the vote for President and Vice-President of the United States." Who was John Langdon? John Langdon, a Senator from New Hampshire, was the very first man to sign the Constitution, the work of the convention, under the name of George Washington. He was one of the framers of this very Constitution; he was one of those who gave it his signature to send it to the world; he was one of those who voted for this identical resolution; and he now becomes the hand of the convention to open and to count these very votes under that very resolution which he himself had voted for in the convention that framed the Constitution.

That is not all, Mr. President. Immediately upon the election of Mr. Langdon the following proceedings were had:

Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the cettificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice-President of the United States.

Who was to bear this message to the House of Representatives, that the Senate was now in session to attend upon the opening and counting of the votes by the President of the Senate who had been elected for that sole purpose? It was Oliver Ellsworth, who had done as much in the framing of the Constitution as any other member of the convention. Oliver Ellsworth knew what he was going to the House of Representatives for. He knew that the Senate of the United States was merely performing the duty of attending while the President of the Senate opened and counted the votes for President and Vice-President August Vice-President August Vice-President Vice-President the Senate opened and counted the votes for resident and resolution ident of the United States.

That is not all, sir. Who else was there? Of the ten members of the Senate at that time, six were members of the convention that framed the Constitution. Of the very Senate that passed this resolution, the very Senate that ordered Mr. Ellsworth to 30 to the House of Representatives and invite them to attend to witness the counting of the votes by the President of the Senate, six had been participants in framing this very Constitution. There, if I remember correctly, were Langdon, and Ellsworth, and Robert Morris, and Bassett of Delaware, and Few of Georgia. There were the very men who knew exactly what was the intention of the framers of the Constitution, and knew exactly how to carry out that intention in setting the ma-chinery of the Government in motion. What did they go? Mr. Ellsworth went to the House of Representatives. The Senator from Ohio when he spoke about this precedent being of no great force added also that this most admirable compilation or history of the First Cong ess made by our worthy Chief Clerk was not an accurate account, and that an opposite presumption might be drawn by reading the Journal. He is mistaken. I have examined another history of Congress by Mr. Blanchard of the First Congress, and it corresponds exactly; and to-day I have got the Journals of the Senate from 1789 to 1793, and they confirm, and not only confirm, but make stronger, the theory that the House of Representatives and the Senate were mere attendants upon the duty discharged by the President of the Senate: they had no part or lot in it except to furnish two gentlemen on the part of the House and one on the part of the Senate to sit at the Clerk's table and make out a list as the President of the Senate declared the votes of the States. That is all. Let us see. Mr. Ellsworth proceeded to the House of Representatives and informed them that-

The Senate is now ready in the Senate Chamber to proceed, in the presence of the House, to discharge that duty.

I read from the Journal.

He informed them also that the Senate have appointed one of their members-To do what?

to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared-

Declared by the President of the Senate-submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their members for the like purpose.

He reported that he had delivered the message.

Mr. Boudinot, from the House of Representatives, communicated the following verbal message to the Senate:

"Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House is ready forthwith to meet the Senate, to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the electors of the President and Vice-President of the United States

"To attend," to wait upon the President of the Senate as witnesses to attend him as he performs his duty, but not to take any part in the performance of that duty, not to interfere with him in discharging his office of opening, counting, and declaring the electoral votes of the various States; and so it goes on. They appointed tellers.

The President elected for the purpose of counting the votes-

That is the record of the First Congress. The record leaves out "opening the votes;" but—

The President elected for the purpose of counting the votes declared to the Senate that the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he—

in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States; which were as follows.

That is not all. John Langdon gave the certificate to George Washington of his election, and in that certificate, as the Senate will see, announced that-

The underwritten, appointed President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes of the electors, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all

He, John Langdon, did, and nobody else did; and he certified that Washington was elected, and sent messengers to the President and to the Vice-President.

That is not all. What was done at the very next election of the President of the United States when George Washington was again elected? I turn to page 480 of this volume of the Journal. The very question was brought to the attention of the two Houses at that time; for there was a resolution passed by the House of Representatives to which the Senate gave its concurrence, which will be found on page 480:

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution of the House of Representatives that a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to ascertain and report a mode of examining—a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice-President, and of notifying the persons who shall be elected of their election, and for regulating the time, place, and manner of administering the oath of office to the President.

Of examining the votes, not counting them. The counting was done by the President of the Senate, and nobody at that day supposed for a moment that Congress could dislodge him from the position in which the framers of the Constitution had placed him. Now see, page 484, the report of that committee, composed of Mr. Izard and other gentlemen who had been members of the constitutional convention. James Madison was one of that committee on the part of the House; and I presume no man was more familiar with the Constitution, then but a few years framed, in which he took such a part; no man could have been more familiar with it, and no man could have known the intention and object of the framers of that instrument better than James Madison:

Mr. King, from the joint'committee appointed the 6th February, instant, reported, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday next. at twelve o'clock; that one person be appointed a teller, on the part of the Senate, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared.

By the President of the Senate, just as it had been done four years before, when he opened them and read them, and the tellers made the count under his eye and under his hand, using them merely to do the manual labor of making the list, and certifying and handing it to him that he might announce the result.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to ask the Senator from Maryland if the object of that resolution of the House for examining the votes of the electors of the different States was not to ascertain whether they were electoral votes or not? What was the object of examining on the part of the two Houses, unless it was with some view of regulating and controlling the counting of the votes?

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, it was for the simple purpose of being a check upon the Vice-President or President of the Senate, so that the very object of the Constitution should be complied with of having witnesses who saw the certificates before the count had been announced by the Vice-President. That was the object. What is the meaning of tellers? Only to keep a tally of the votes. What power has a teller in an election but to keep a tally of the votes? He is only to mark them down and see that they correspond with the enunciation by the Chair. That is all, Mr. President.

To make a list of the votes as they shall be declared, that the result shall be de-livered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote and the persons elected to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid; which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice-President, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Therefore in the beginning the eye of Congress was turned to this very question, and they recognized that the President of the Senate was the proper depositary of the votes, and that he was the proper person to discharge the duty of making the count and announcing it to the country in the presence of the two Houses. If any resolution of the House shows that, it was merely to attend upon the President of the Senate when he makes this count.

I have shown, Mr. President, that this was a resolution first from the convention that framed the Constitution to the First Congress, and that the First Congress obeyed that order, and after that the Con-gress in session when George Washington was elected the second time confirmed everything that had been done by the preceding Congress, and that was the uniform practice from that day down to 1865, for in 1857 Mr. Mason, presiding over the two Houses, did not count the vote of Wisconsin, as I shall show directly.

Some Senators seem to think that this is an extraordinary power. Why should it be so deemed? In regard to the election of President you have to find some similitude in your mode of procedure from the past. You have to look at the operations of your States, for after all we all, or certainly those of us who think the way I think upon constitutional questions generally, maintain that the Federal Government is but an aggregation of the State governments, and therefore what will apply within a State government may very well apply to the National Government so far as its method of exercising power is concerned; and does not every Senator on this floor know that the governors of nearly all the States, if not all of them, possess the same power in regard to the returns of elections of State officers? Certainly in my State, and I believe in most of the other States, the governors. ernor issues a commission upon the returns made through the clerks' offices of the various courts, or through the local boards of canvassers. He looks at those returns, and he issues the commission, and declares the party elected. Is not that so ? What is his duty? The other day my friend from Indiana seemed incredulously to smile when he asked me whether I considered it a ministerial duty to decide between two returns, and I said yes. I repeat it. There is not a canvasser of any State in this Union that does not have to do that very thing, and yet everybody knows his office is ministerial.

Mr. MERRIMON. Quasi judicial?

Mr. WHYTE. No, sir; not quasi judicial. On the contrary it is purely ministerial, and just as ministerial as that of the clerk of a court who is authorized to record a deed, and will not record the morning newspaper if you take it to him and ask him to do it. He is bound to record a deed where the law is complied with, and he looks to the deed to see if the law is complied with and if it is a deed to be recorded. If it is not, he is not bound to record it. Who would for a moment say that that was the exercise of a quasi judicial duty? for a moment say that that was the exercise of a quasi judicial duty? Cooley on Limitations lays it down so broad that no man can doubt it, that the power of a canvasser, though you may call it quasi judicial if you please, is not quasi judicial, but purely ministerial from the beginning to the end. Take, in passing, the case of a marriage license. A clerk of a court is authorized to issue a marriage license, but not to a minor. A gentleman presents himself at his desk and asks him for a marriage license. He looks at him and doubts whether he is of age. He has a right to refuse it if he thinks proper, and subject that man to the necessity of a mandams to compel him to perform that man to the necessity of a mandamus to compel him to perform that duty. More than that, he has a right to swear the man, and ascer-tain whether he is a minor or not before he issues a license. It is a purely ministerial duty. It has been recognized by everybody as a ministerial duty so far as the ordinary boards of canvassers are concerned. Such a person is a mere canvassing officer. In my judgment he represents the State. The State votes for President. Each State, says the Constitution, shall, under the direction of the Legislature, appoint electors, and the President of the Senate is the canvasser for the States; and, as such canvasser, performs merely the ministerial duty of deciding, prima facie, who is elected President or Vice-President dent of the United States. Now, no Senator need answer me by saying that that decides the whole case, because there is no provision in the Constitution which looks to a contested presidential election. That may be an omission in the Constitution which ought to be supplied. Then you can take the contested election to the Supreme Court of the United States to determine who ought to be the lawful occupant of the White House; but, until some such provision is made in the Constitution, the President of the Senate, as a ministerial officer, determines who is elected President and Vice-President of the United States. Kent says so:

The President of the Senate, on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the electors, in the presence of both Houses of Congress, opens all the certificates, and the votes are then to be counted. The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared. In the case of questionable votes, and a closely contested election, this power may be all-important; and, I presume, in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes, and determines the result, and that the two Houses are present only as spectators, to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice be made by the electors.

Sir, the presumption is conclusive, there being nothing else in the Constitution, the Constitution not specifically saying by whom, the Presumption is, from all the surrounding language, that the two Houses are only there as spectators, and that the President of the Senate is the proper person to count and to declare the vote; and, if I am not much mistaken, the distinguished Senator from Indiana thought the same way when he made his speech on the 17th of January, 1873:

Clearly-Said he

the framers of the Constitution did not contemplate that the President of the Senthe framers of the Constitution did not contemplate that the President of the Senate in opening and counting the vote for President and Vice-President should exercise any discreti mary or judicial powers in determining between the votes of two sets of electors, or upon the sufficiency or validity of the record of the votes of the electors in any State; but that he should perform a merely ministerial act, of which high powers may devolve upon him exencessitate ver, and whatever decision he may make between the two sets of electors or upon the sufficiency and validity of the record of the votes—whether on the evidence of the right of the electors to cast votes, or whether they have been cast in the manner prescribed by the Constitution—his decision is final.

So that the Senator from Indiana clearly accepted that as the true construction, that having this ministerial power lodged with him out of the necessity of things he might be called upon on some occasion to declare which of two returns he would take, or whether the people had the right to vote or not, and the Senator stated then that he considered his decision to be final, and I agree with him. If it is to be changed, it is to be changed by a constitutional amendment, and in no other form. Let us see what else the Senator said on that same subject on that occasion:

subject on that occasion:

The Constitution provides that the President of the Senate shall be the depositary of the electoral votes of the States, and that he "shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." It has been generally conceded that this means that the two Houses shall be present in their separate characters, and not as a joint convention; that they cannot act and vote as one body; that the two bodies cannot deliberate and act as separate bodies in each others' presence; that they are simply brought together to witness the result of the opening an I counting of the vote as reported by the President of the Senate. The fact that tellers have been generally appointed by the two Houses in nowise affects the question, for they are mere facilities to actually count and make record of such votes as the Vice-President hands to them for that purpose.

Can there be any doubt that it was the view of the Senator then that it was conceded on all hands that that was the status of the case under the Constitution of the United States? But, Mr. President, I may not perhaps be adding any strength to my argument with the Senate; but certainly to my judgment the authority I am about to quote was a high authority on constitutional questions; and therefore I ask permission to call the attention of the Senate to this question as presented by the late President of the United States and late tion as presented by the late President of the United States and late Senator who we regret to miss from the chair in my rear. I refer to a veto which he sent to Congress on the 20th of July, 1868-a veto which I had the honor to vote to sustain in company with Senator Hendricks and other gentlemen on this floor. It is not material to read any other portion of the message or to discuss any other part of the question raised in his veto further than this particular point referring to the power of the President of the Senate. Said President Johnson, on the 20th of July, 1868:

Johnson, on the 20th of July, 1868:

The mode and manner of receiving and counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States are in plain and simple terms prescribed by the Constitution. That instrument imperatively requires that the President of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." Congress has, therefore, no power under the Constitution to receive the electoral votes or reject them. The whole power is exhausted when, in the presence of the two Houses, the votes are counted and the result declared. In this respect the power and duty of the President of the Senate are, under the Constitution, purely ministerial. When, therefore, the joint resolution declares that no electoral votes shall be received or counted from States that since the 4th of March, 1867, have not "adopted a constitution of State government under which a State government shall have been organized," a power is assumed which is nowhere delegated to Congress.

And so all the better reasoning in the case of Wisconsin was that way. There is no argument worthy of the name of argument that can be presented in reply to the statement of the case as made by Mr. Stuart, of Michigan, at that time, which Mr. Collamer thought so strong and so important in its character that he refused to vote for the resolution that had been proposed by Mr. Crittenden; and I ask the attention of the Senate to Mr. Collamer's remarks on that subject. We all know that the certificate of the vote of Wisconsin showed hat the electoral college had met a day after the day appointed by law for casting the electoral vote, by reason of a snow-storm. We all know that Mr. Mason did not count Wisconsin, upon the ground that it would make no difference whether Wisconsin was counted or not; the result was the same; and, therefore, the vote was not counted. A debate arose, and Mr. Toombs, of Georgia, made a violent demonstration against the ruling of the President of the Senate. The announcement was made, and the Houses separated. The debate was resumed in each House, and, in the Senate, Mr. Crittenden, after a long debate, offered this resolution:

Resolved by the Scnate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the electoral vote of the State of Wisconsin in the late presidential election, being given on a day different from that prescribed by law, was therefore null, and ought not to have been admitted or included in the count of electoral votes given in the late presidential election.

The Senate laid that resolution on the table, after Mr. Collamer's speech, without even a division. Now, let us see what Mr. Collamer said:

I very much doubt whether the framers of the Constitution ever intended to leave the subject of the presidential election to the House of Representatives or the Senate, or either or both of them. There was a great deal of dedate in the convention that framed the Constitution as to the manner of choosing a President of the United States. Various projects were presented. Among others, it was very gravely debated whether he had not better be elected by Congress. For some consideration that proposition was under consideration. Various plans were put forward, various suggestions made as to the manner of choosing a President, and much difficulty was found in relation to it before a plan was arrived at and that so soon resulted in a practical failure as to lead to the change in the Constitution to what it now is in this respect. The Constitution vested in each House the power to decide upon the election of its members; it provided carefully that it would not trust to the two Houses to elect a President.

That is what we are trying to do here to-day.

It seems to me that if we consult history at all, and consider the probability of things even as they fall within our own observation and experience, we shall find that there is very little practical difference between leaving the presidential election to Congress and leaving Congress to decide that election.

He could not put it better than that by the use of human language. The convention would not leave it to Congress to elect, and now Congress proposes to elect for itself.

Mr. THURMAN. Shall I interrupt the Senator if I make a suggestion?

Mr. WHYTE. Not at all.

Mr. WHYIE. Not at all.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator think that the question before the Senate is whether we can go back of a return admitted to be genuine and regular upon its face? If he supposes that to be the question, I must say that I do not suppose it to be the question; nor do I see how it is involved. I certainly do not admit that you can go back and go into a contest of the election at all. I submit that the remarks that have been made, which he has read, both by the late Senator Johnson and Mr. Collamer and Mr. Crittenden, do not refer to a case like the present at all. The question now is, what must we do when the question is which of two returns is the genuine return? When you have decided which of them is the genuine return, I admit you cannot go back of that.

cannot go back of that.

Mr. WHYTE. Yes, sir, that is just what I am on. I say that Congress has no right to assume to itself to decide which is the right return, because the Constitution has put it in the hands of the President of the Senate, and until you amend the Constitution you have no right to take it away from him. That is my argument. The Senator was not in when I first commenced or he would have known that the is my argument. that that is precisely what I say. It is tinkering with the Constitu-tion if you do not go a step further. You want to decide which of the two returns is the right one, and not to go behind the return and take the evidence that is to give you the power to decide judicially. What is it that is to be done? One party in the House may say one is the right return; another party in the Senate may say another is the right return; and the State is disfranchised, which our fathers never meant.

The President of the Senate is the custodian of these votes; he is the can vasser of these votes; and he is just where the governor of a State is when he is bound to issue a commission upon the returns that are sent to him. He is bound to look at the returns and see that they comply with the law, and then he is to issue a commission to the man who upon the face of the return has a majority of the votes cast. That is the state of the case. I say that is a mere ministerial duty, and I should like to be pointed to some authority to the contrary. Every governor has to discharge that duty, not as governor, not in the discharge of those executive functions which are political exclusively in their character, and which are not subject to the revision of the courts. Take the case of a governor; and I liken the President of the Senate to him, for I see no difference. Suppose the President of the Senate wantonly rejects the legitimate return from a State; is there no power to compel him to count it? Is there a power to compel the governor of a State to count a return properly certified? The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] truly said the other day there can be but one right return and one wrong one, and our fathers never expected us to legislate for a case where there should be two executives of a State at one time. Our fathers never expected us to be in a condition that we should doubt what was the executive authority which certified to the electors in any State of this Union. The Constitution prescribes the duty to the President of the Senate. The law of 1792 shows him how the certifica es are to be certified to him, shows him now he is to know who are the persons in the States claiming to be electors; and on that he has got to answer to the country and to his God that he discharges his duty faithfully. If he discharges it wickedly and puts aside a regular return which he ought to count, is he not in the same position as the governor of Kentucky, who is bound to issue a commission to the attorney-general upon the returns of the canvassers or the county clerks that he has a majority of the votes cast? When be adds them up and finds he has got a majority of the votes cast? When he adds them up and finds he has got a majority of the votes, he is bound to issue the commission. If he rejects the right return and counts him out, the courts of Kentucky by mandamus will compel him to issue the commission to the lawfully elected officer. That is the law. Nobody knows better than the Senator from Ohio that governors perform ministerial duties as well as discharge their general duties as governors of States. He himself has applied for a mandamus to compel the governor of Ohio to execute a law of his own State which he claimed was merely a ministerial duty upon his part; and in my State it has been decided over and over again, not only by democratic courts but by republican courts, without any reference to politics, upon the plain, square, judicial inquiry, and I ask the attention of the Senate briefly to it. In the case of Magrader vs. Swann, governor, reported in 1866, in 25 Maryland Reports, there is a review of all the cases:

The cases cited were used to sustain the position that the executive, in his political or discretionary powers, was beyond all judicial interference, not to sanction the application of the principle to the facts of each case.

Here is the clause of the constitution:

All elections of judges and other officers, provided for by this constitution, (states' attorneys excepted,) shall be certified and the returns made by the clerks of the respective counties to the governor, who shall issue commissions to the different persons for the offices to which they shall have been respectively elected, and in all such elections the person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared to be elected.

The court held, in regard to the duties devolved upon the governor by these sections of article 4, that

These are auxiliary ministerial duties imposed on the governor preliminary to the qualification of the judges and other officers, in the discharge of which he has been invested with no discretion, but is imperatively required by the organic law to perform in order to keep the departments of government in motion. The clerks' certificates determine "who has the greatest number of votes," or whether "the opposing candidates have an equal number of votes." In either event the injunction of the constitution is equally peremptory.

To go a step further, to show that this duty is merely ministerial, I refer to the case of The People vs. Pease, in the New York court of appeals, also decided, if I can judge from the names, by judges a majority of whom were in opposition to the democratic party. Speaking of canvassers, the court say:

These are all the safeguards the Legislature have thought proper to provide to insure the prevention of frandulent or illegal voting, and this leaves but little discretion to the inspectors. Their duties, except in the single instance adverted to, are simply ministerial in the reception of the votes, and entirely so in counting and making returns thereof.

And then, when they come to speak further on of the board of county canvassers, they say:

It is made the duty of the board of county canvassers, upon the statement of votes given, to determine what person by the greatest number of votes has been duly elected to any office mentioned in said statement. * * * And the certificate of the board of canvassers authorized to canvass the votes given for any elective office is made evidence of the election of the person therein declared to have been elected.

The inspectors of elections are not judicial, but administrative officers. Their decision is final only as to receiving or rejecting votes; but the question whether a voter was or was not entitled to vote is open to examination in subsequent proceedings upon any competent evidence. (13 New York Court of Appeals Reports, page 45)

There is a clause in this decision in regard to county canvassers which maintains the same ground precisely.

Mr. MORTON. Would it interrupt my friend if I called his atten-

Mr. MORTON. Would it interrupt my friend if I called his attention to a point in the line of his argument?

Mr. WHYTE. Not at all.

Mr. MORTON. I venture to suggest to the Senator from Indiana that, as I understand ministerial duty and as it is defined in books of law, it is one which is to be performed under the direction of another. Bouvier describes it thus:

That which is done under the authority of a superior; opposed to judicial; as, the sheriff is a ministerial officer, bound to obey the judicial commands of the court.

Where a duty is prescribed by law and the officer is simply to follow the law and do the particular thing the law requires, it is done by the direction of the Legislature and it is purely ministerial. Take the case which was presented from Louisiana in 1873. Suppose, when the President of the Senate comes to count the vote in the presence of the two Houses, he finds upon his desk two sets of returns from the State of Louisiana each of which bears what purports to be the great seal of the State, each signed by a person claiming to be governor. The question as to which of these returns is the valid and legal return from Louisiana is a question that is not ministerial, in my judgment, at all. It is the highest form of political duty, or, as was suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] in one sense you may call it a judicial duty. If there is but one set of returns, and they are in form, and he opens them and counts them, that is ministerial; but where he is called upon to decide some question that is not determined upon the face of the paper itself, that is a political duty of the highest character, and is as far from a ministerial duty as any political duty can be.

Let me make a further suggestion. I will take the case of but one return. Suppose, when the President of the Senate opens that return, he finds that there is no statement on the tace of the return that the electors voted by ballot, as the Constitution requires. Is it necessary that the return should show the fact that the Constitution has been complied with? The decision of that question is political in its highest character. One lawyer may say that it is not necessary for the return to show that the electors voted by ballot; that is presumed to be their duty. Others may say that the return must show that the Constitution was complied with. Who is to decide that question? In one sense it is a judicial question of the highest character. The decision of that question is not ministerial at all. Again, the electors are required to vote for one person for President and another person for Vice-President, who shall not both be citizens of the same State. Suppose the returns showed, as in the case of Georgia at the very last count, that the persons receiving votes for President and Vice-President both lived in the same State. That was the fact in regard to three votes from Georgia? Shall the result of that be to cast the vote out? What shall be done with it? Shall it be rejected? The decision of that question is not ministerial, but is as far from it as it can be.

Mr. THURMAN. And in the case of Georgia the vote was for Gree-y, who was dead.

which my friend read:

Mr. MORTON. The question was whether the vote for Greeley should be counted. In that case it was a notorious fact that he was dead; but it was a very important question, because it went to determine what constituted a majority of all the electors appointed. It might become a very important question in a close contest. The decision of the question as to whether the vote of Georgia should be counted or not was very far from being ministerial.

One word further. Take the case of common canvassers in an election return created under the laws of a State. So far as their duty consists in simply counting the votes sent up, it is ministerial; but if there is a discretionary power reposed with that board of canvassers to determine certain questions that may arise, that discretionary duty is not ministerial, but it is judicial in its character. Almost every board of canvassers in every one of the States has to some extent judicial power conferred upon it. I want to call the attention of my friend to a point which I think is stated in the passage he read from Kent, that in the absence of legislation the President of the Senate will count the vote. I quote from the report of the committee from Clearly the framers of the Constitution did not contemplate that the President of the Senate, in opening and counting the vote for President and Vice-President, should exercise any discretionary or judicial power in determining between the votes of two sets of electors or upon the sufficiency or validity of the record of the votes of the electors in any State; but that he should perform a merely ministerial act, of which the two Houses were to be witnesses and to make record. But the exercise of these high powers may devolve upon him ex necessitate ref, and whatever decision he may make between the two sets of electors or upon the sufficiency and validity of the record of the votes—whether on the evidence of the right of the electors to cast votes or whether they have been cast in the manner prescribed by the Constitution—his decision is final.

And unquestionably so. I presume the fact is that the framers of the Constitution and those who counted the votes during the first few elections did not contemplate the fact of two sets of electors. No such contingency ever happened until the case of New Jersey, within the last twenty-five years. They contemplated simply a ministerial duty. They did not expect the President of the Senate to perform anything but a ministerial duty; but, as stated by Kent and as stated in this report, if the two Houses of Congress decline to take any jurisdiction of the questions that may arise, then that duty would be devolved upon him ex necessitate rei. Somebody must decide it, and if he finds two sets of returns upon his table, if the two Houses of Congress refuse to decide the question, then the President of the Senate must decide it. He then determines whether the Kellogg govsenate must decide it. He then determines whether the Kellogg government or whether the McEnery government is the lawful government of Louisiana, whether McEnery should ceraify to the electors or Kellogg could do it; and in doing that it seems to me he would be exercising the very highest form of political power, entirely aside from a ministerial duty.

Mr. WHYTE. Now let me ask my friend the Senator from Maryland a question. The Clerk of the last House of Representatives makes up a list of the succeeding House of Representatives. Suppose two sets of gentlemen claiming to represent the State of Louisiana in the House of Representatives, one with a certificate signed by Kellogg, the other with a certificate signed by McEnery, ask to be put upon the roll, so that when the roll is called they will be there to answer to their names; and the Clerk of the House puts one set on. Does the Senator from Indiana call that a judicial duty?

Mr. MORTON. As I understand the law organizing the House of Representatives it authorizes the Clerk of the old House to make up the roll of members of the new one for the purpose of organization; and should there be two sets of members certified to by different persons each claiming to be the governor of the State of Louisiana, inasmuch as the law authorizes the Clerk to make up the roll, it from necessity gives to him the choice for the time being, and that far his duty is not ministerial. It is a higher duty, but it is one devolved upon him by the law.

Mr. WHYTE. I will ask the Senator another question, because I differ with him upon that point. Suppose the governor of Indiana is authorized to issue a commission to the auditor-general of that State, if there is one, who shall be elected by a majority of the people of the State, and the law requires that the returns shall be made by the State, and the law requires that the returns shall be made by the clerks of the courts. Suppose the clerk of a court sends two returns, or there are returns from two persons claiming to be clerk of a court, and the governor of the State decides in favor of one of them, is that the performance of a judicial duty? Is the determining whether a law has been complied with the performance of a judicial duty?

Mr. MORTON. If I understand the question put by my friend, it is the made the greater of a State is called upon to convenience a State.

is where the governor of a State is called upon to commission a State officer, the auditor for example, and the clerks of the counties have sent up two sets of returns. The question supposes that the governor in that case may choose between these returns and determine which is the proper return, and issue a commission accordingly. If the law of the State authorizes the governor in such a case to decide which of the two returns is the correct one, that power of decision is not ministerial; it is judicial clearly.

Mr. WHYTE. But where it is just as the constitution leaves it, and there is no provision of law?

Mr. MORTON. Then the law authorizes him to make that decision. If there are two sets of returns both certified by competent authority, the governor has no discretionary power, he cannot issue a commission to anybody, because there is no evidence before him authorizing him to do it; but if the law of the State authorizes him in that contingency to decide which of the two is the correct return, the exercise of that discretionary power is not ministerial but it is judicial. In some States the governors have such power conferred upon them; in other States they have not. In the State of Indiana the governor has no such power, and if he should make such a decision and issue a commission his act would be a nullity and in violation of law. But if the law gave him the power to determine which of the two returns of the county clerks is the correct and true return, then the exercise of that discretionary power would be judicial.

Mr. WHYTE. The question has been decided over and over again that where the governor is authorized and required to issue a commission upon certain returns made to him, he has to issue a commission and the contest comes afterward. He is bound to deliver the commission as the prima facie title. It is his duty to do it or the wheels of government would stop. There would be a hiatus in the office if there was no provision of law that the prior incumbent held until his successor was appointed and qualified.

Mr. MORTON. Let me say to my friend that in the case he supposes himself, there is no prima facie title. He supposes a case where the lawful clerk of the county has made two returns, each of which is certified by the proper authority. In that case if the returns are contradictory, one is as prima facie correct as the other, and so there is no prima facie case about it. But if the governor is authorized to decide which is the correct return, I submit to my friend that that is not ministerial.

Mr. WHYTE. I am sorry to differ from so distinguished a lawyer. The courts, as far as I have examined the question, are unanimous upon that subject, that it is a ministerial duty, and governors have been compelled by a mandamus to perform that duty.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Maryland inform me whether in any case where an act of judgment is devolved upon an officer his view that the power is ministerial would apply?

Mr. WHYTE. No, sir. Where he has discretionary power a mandamus will not lie; but where he is in the discharge of a mere ministerial duty a mandamus will lie. Let us see why a mandamus will not lie against the President of the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator will permit me, the point I would like to make is that where two certificates come up it is an act of judgment to determine which one of those certificates is the right one; and if it be an act of judgment it is not a mere ministerial act. The opening of a certificate, is a mere ministerial act unquestionably. The counting of the vote may be a mere ministerial act, but it may also involve an act of judgment. Where there are two certificates it necessarily does involve an act of judgment.

Mr. WHYTE. If my friend will read Cooley on the subject he will find the whole thing explained and all the authorities cited. He will see that it is not an act judicial in its character, but that it is simply attached to the ministerial duty that the party may discharge it intelligently. Cooley cites the very case, according to my recollection, (for I cannot lay my hand upon the book,) of the clerk of a court who has to see that he complies with the law, who has to examine the paper that he is authorized to record to see that it complies with the law before he records it. The President of the Senate is in no other position than the governor of a State who is authorized to issue a commission upon the returns made to him. If there are two returns, there must be a lawful return and an unlawful one. If there are two governors there must be a lawful are two governors, there must be a lawful governor and an unlawful governor. Therefore there must be a right and a wrong. Neither the learned Senator from Indiana nor the Senator from Ohio need point out to me defects in the Constitution. I am not saying that there are no defects in the Constitution. I am not saying that it is the perfection of wisdom, because we know ourselves that at the election of Jefferson in 1801 the defect of this very clause in the Constitution about the electors was discovered, and that it was amended; but our fathers had not got quite as far advanced in political ethics as we have. They did not an icipate two governors in one State. They thought the States were hardly big enough for more than one governor each, and therefore they looked to a return certified by one governor. ernor. I admit that you have to make some amendment to the Constitution, and all that I have argued against here is that by legislation you are seeking to take away from the President of the Senate his constitutional power. All that I have been attempting to say is to show that the power is with him, and that you are bound to amend the Constitution if you mean to take it away from him; and if you mean to give any person or any umpire authority to decide upon the returns, you had better go a step further and go behind the returns themselves. I have not much faith in election returns after the exhibit of the manner in which they were concocted in Louisiana. I do not speak of any party; I have not much faith in the men who put them up; and therefore if you are going to determine which of two returns you will take, go behind the returns and propose a constitutional amendment that will lodge the power to decide upon the prima facie case first, and then submit it to some court or some judicial tribunal to determine upon testimony who has been lawfully elected the President of the United States. That is the point I make. I am not quite sure that that power is not now lodged in the courts of the United States. I am not sure of the entire truth of the remark which fell States. I am not sure of the entire truth of the remark which fell from the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Stevenson] the other day about the power of issuing a mandamus against the President of the Senate not being lodged either with the Supreme Court of the United States, exercising original jurisdiction, or with one of the courts of this District, and then the Supreme Court having appellate jurisdiction in the case. Why? Who votes for electors? Each State votes for electors. Each State can vote by its Legislature. It can vote by general ticket, and let a majority of the people of each State choose the electors. It can vote by districts. It can vote in any way the Legislature of the State shall determine. Therefore the State votes. The State is interested in having its vote counted. Suppose when the lawful State government sends its electoral vote here the President of the Senate refuses to count it. Why cannot that State, through its properly authorized officer, apply to the Supreme Court through its properly authorized officer, apply to the Supreme Court of the United States for a mandamos to compel the President of the Senate to count its vote? I would like to see some authorities to the contrary. If the Supreme Court cannot exercise original jurisdiction where a State is a party, because there the State is a party in claiming its vote, then the people can through the circuit court of the district and by appeal to the Supreme Court, test the question as to which is the lawful return upon which the President of the Senate is bound to base his decision.

I do not differ with gentlemen here that there is a defect in the Constitution in not providing for a case of contested election of President and Vice-President of the United States. I will vote to submit to the people of the States a constitutional amendment providing who shall count, who shall declare, in the first instance, the prima facie title to the office of President and Vice-President, and also designating a tribunal before which the contested election may be heard and decided in behalf of the person lawfully entitled to the office and lawfully chosen by a majority of the people in the several States; but I will vote for no bill that undertakes to assert upon the part of Congress the power of counting the electoral vote and deprive the President of the Senate of it, as I understand him to be entitled to it under the Constitution as it now is.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, after this protracted debate upon a subject-matter the need of legislation in respect to which all of us admit, I should not think of engaging the attention of the Senate for a moment did either the discussion itself or the bill before the Senate meet certain difficulties which have for a long time existed in my mind in reference to this question. It was my lot for many years to be upon a committee in the other branch corresponding to the one which has reported this bill here, before which this subject was frequently brought, growing out of the apprehensions in the public mind arising from the danger which at this point the Government of the United States seemed exposed to in 1857, in 1861, and again in 1869. Although those dangers were of a different kind on each of those successive occasions, yet in attempting to find some remedy, some guard against the evil and the danger which those discussions gave rise to, I have listened patiently in this debate to see if the difficulties which I then encountered had found a solution either in this debate or in the bill before the Senate. I hope I may be permitted to express my disappointment that after so long a time and such a discussion, under circumstances so favorable, in which all parties seem to have addressed themselves to the question without the bias or passion of party; when no measure can become a law unless it receives the sanction of both parties, no measure is agitated that can have any possible bearing upon any future contingency so far as we can foresee it now.

This bill in so far as it follows the outlines of the Constitution is without difficulty; but the moment it attempts to approach and grapple with the questions that may arise, with the actual difficulties, with those dangers to which I have alluded, if they ever shall exist, it seems to me it utterly fails. My disappointment is that there is going upon the statute-book a delusion, an appearance of provision against danger under which, when that danger shall arise, it will be found to be utterly unprovided for; and so we shall be carried along in fancied security until we are upon the danger itself, and when provision for it will be in the nature of things utterly impossible.

Those difficulties I wish briefly to state to see whether there is any relief from them either in this bill or in any possibility of legislation, and whether we had not better have addressed ourselves to some amendment of the Constitution rather than to have attempted to tide over a danger with what is, in my mind, utterly insufficient and will prove rather a snare than a protection. Take the electoral college from the moment its action comes under the provisions of the United States Government, either the Constitution or any legislation; follow step by step all the proceedings; and the moment you undertake to provide for the question which this bill and this earnest effort of this committee and this discussion is seeking to provide for, you run at once counter to the very provisions of the Constitution itself, and why? Because the danger is something else than that which we have discussed. It does not arise upon the papers. It does not arise upon any question that can be decided, whether by the President of the Senate or the two Houses of Congress, or any umpire that it is possible to provide for, upon the papers themselves. A discussion or deliberation of two hours' duration is provided in this bill. The Constitution provided that the States should appoint the electors. It was not anybody else but the States, the States as States, and in just such manner as each individual State should deem best. One State might appoint them by a popular vote; another by its Legislature; a third might clothe its governor with power to appoint them; but however appointed, it was the act of the State. It was the State, and not the nation, that was to a point them; and the State was to take good care, in the opinion of the framers of the Constitution, that its act, whatever it was, was to be verified by the State and not by the nation. The State was to verify its act and certify it in such way as each State might determine so to certify its act.

Each State shall appoint-

Is the language of the Constitution-in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

In point of fact one State did provide that it should be by popular ote. To day in my State—and I doubt not that is an illustration of all the States—there are three methods: First, the popular method, and, if that fails, the legislative method; and, when the college meets on the first Wednesday in December, if there is a failure of a sufficient number to meet, the college itself fills up the number. But, however they were to be chosen, it was the act of the State, and it was the business of the State to verify and certify its own act and furnish each elector with the evidence of his appointment. Then the United States takes up the matter, and from that point provides by law just what is to be done. These electors bearing the certificate of their State are by the provisions of the Constitution and of the statute to meet at such place as the Legislature of the State has determined, and there in the manner prescribed by the Constitution these men bearing the certificate of the State, and these alone, are to cast their votes in a manner so particularly, so carefully guarded that the idea that it is possible for these particular men ever to make a mistake, or for any-body to ever make any mistake about the action of these particular men, seemed to be considered a phantom, a far-fetched idea. are, after they have voted and each man subscribed his name to the vote and sealed it up, by a special messenger to send that particular action, and no other, to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate is the sole constitutional custodian of these certificates from the several States. He is to bring them upon a particular day into the presence of the two Houses, of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and he is to open them. He is not to open anything else but these certificates. Nobody can clothe him with power to open anything else but the genuine certificate of each State; but that carries along with it the incidental power of determining whether the paper in his hand is that certificate or not. Right there at the outset, before he breaks its seal, he is to determine whether he does break the seal of this certificate or whether he has a false certificate in his hand. So far, incidental to the duty with which the Constitution clothes him of receiving and keeping this certificate and in the presence of the two Houses opening it—incidental to that and without which he cannot determine that he has performed this act—he must decide whether the paper coming into his hands is the genuine certificate. Then the several certificates, all opened by him and before him, are to be counted. When? When he is with them there in the presence of the two Houses, and nowhere else. That, it seems to me, disposes of every one of these amendments that propose to take these certificates out of the presence of the two Houses and submit them to another tribunal to be created for the purpose of determining what these men shall count, and then for us to say that a tribunal created by us determining what shall be counted does not

I am not going into the argument that has been so elaborately made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Whyte] as to whether these votes shall be counted by the President of the Senate or by the two Houses, because so far as my difficulties are concerned it does not matter. I have heard no one say that they were to be counted by anybody else, and therefore after he has brought them into a constitutional presence, if I may use that word, namely, the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives, they are "then" to be counted. That is, when they are there; and therefore they cannot be counted in any other presence and before any other tribunal or by any other tribunal. I think that the Constitution means that they shall be counted by the two Houses. I cannot quite agree with the Senator from Maryland, that they are to be counted by the President of the Senate, for the reason that the framers of the Constitution kept in their mind, when they prepared for the election of President, the States. They provided, as I have said, that the States should appoint the electors, that the college of electors should in the first instance choose the President and the Vice-President; they provided that, if the college of electors shall fail to do their duty, then the States in the House of Representatives, as States, shall elect the President, and the States as represented in the Senate shall elect the Vice-President. They have kept up the idea of the States all through, until, as they supposed, they had secured beyond peradventure the election of a President.

I am not discussing the question whether we can now in this day

I am not discussing the question whether we can now in this day afford to stand upon the ground of the States as against the people in the popular branch. I am one of those who believe in State rights, and I am one of those who so far as State rights are defined in the Constitution are for preserving them with sacred care, and I shall stand up for them. More than any other feature of this whole Constitution this idea is prominent, running from the time when the States reserved to themselves the power in such manner as they pleased of appointing the electoral college to the time when, if the electoral college fail to make that choice, they devolved it upon the States in the House of Representatives to choose the President and upon the States in these two bodies are there for any purpose whatever, they are first there to aid in the counting of the votes; and the question is whether they are there as one body or as two. The Constitution says this shall be done, not in the presence of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, but in the presence of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. Therefore the only question that can possibly arise at that point, namely, whether the paper that the Vice-President opens is the real, genuine paper coming from the electors of a State, must be decided either by the two as one body or by the two in their separate capacity as Senate and House of Representatives. You depart at once from the whole theory and tenor of the provision the moment you say it is to be done by them in convention in one body. If you follow it out and in harmony with all its provisions, as it seems to me—I am only suggesting how it strikes my own mind—you must say that this incidental question necessary for the counting of the votes is to be determined by the two Houses as Houses, and so far as this bill recognizes that principle so far this bill is but carrying out what seems to me to be the plain provision of the Constitution. But then from that point I find no comfort in this bill. The

That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses acting separately shall decide to be the true and valid return.

Does that mean two returns purporting to come from the same electoral college? If you reflect how the electoral college acts, you will see that that is a contingency so remote, so impossible to happen, that for us to spend any time in providing for it seems to me to be entirely idle. They are to act on a particular day, and they cannot act on any other day. Each one of them is to vote and to sign his name to his vote, and the sign-manual of every one of them is attached to the certificate stating how they vote. That is to be sealed up on that day, and a special messenger is to take that to the President of the Senate. Now the idea that on that day these same men could do two different acts in that way, vote for one man, and then, before the day closed, falsify that vote by voting for another, supposes a contingency which, I am free to confess, I do not think the framers of the Constitution ever contemplated; and if that is what is meant by deciding between two returns from the same college, it is not worth while for us to spend a great deal of time on so remote and almost impossible a contingency. If, however, it means to meet the case of two returns coming from

If, however, it means to meet the case of two returns coming from a State, purporting to be the action of two sets of electors appointed by the State, what is to be done under this bill? That is a question of fact which set is appointed; and, considering the general manner in which they are appointed, by election by the people, it is a question of fact lying deep down, surrounded by difficulties, and to be determined, not upon inspection of the papers, but upon evidence to be taken outside of the papers, if such a contingency shall ever arise. On those two sets of papers it is proposed here to determine this question of fact, without any hearing of the question of fact whatever, for the papers are to be submitted to the two Houses of Congress and to be decided on a ten-minute debate in two hours. Well, that only puts one's hand on the mouth of a crater in the vain idea that you have closed it up. That is a poor cobweb attempt to smother a volcano. It is a delusion to the people if it means that; and, if it means the other thing, it is an impossibility almost in the nature of the case that there can be two certificates from the same set of men on the same day, under their own seal and under their own hand.

Mr. MERRIMON. Suppose, in a State where the electors are elected by the people, those who are in the minority insist that they really got a majority of the votes?

Mr. DAWES. That is what I am discussing. I say, if it means that, if it means that those electors declared to be chosen are to meet on the proper day and send up a vote, and those who are defeated but who believed that they were really and actually elected are to do the same thing, so that we have two sets of certificates, I can understand that that is a danger upon which we are drifting, a danger which we have had warning time and again to provide for; and that was what I hoped from this able committee there would come out some remedy for. But what is it? It is to take these two certificates, and on the for. But what is it? It is to take these two certificates, and on the face of the certificates, and by a law of Congress limiting the deliberation to two hours, without testimony from any quarter whatever, to reach a result that the people of that State, or of the United States in certain contingencies, everybody will see it is impossible to expect will acquiesce in

Mr. MITCHELL. Allow me to ask a question. Suppose a case of that kind just stated by the Senator, where two returns come up—

Mr. DAWES. From two different bodies?
Mr. MITCHELL. From the same body, in the case stated, where one part of the electoral college claim that they were elected and the one part of the electoral conlege claim that they were elected and the other part claim that they were elected, and two returns come up.

Mr. DAWES. That would be from two different delegations.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. In that case do I understand the Senator to contend that, under the Constitution as it now stands, it is the duty of the President of the Senate to determine, before he breaks the which of the two is the correct return ?

Mr. DAWES. No, I did not say so. If I do not make it clear what I do mean before I get through—

Mr. MITCHELL. I understood the Senator to contend that there could be but one correct return from a State, and that under the Constitution it is the duty of the President of the Senate to determine, before he breaks any seal at all, which is that return.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me. I do think the Senator will admit that there can be but one correct return in point of fact. Mr. MITCHELL. I admit that; but what I want to know is whether the Senator contends that, under the Constitution as it now is, it is the duty of the President of the Senate to determine, before he breaks the seal, which is the correct return?

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will excuse me from answering just at this point, I will proceed. Let me go through with my statement again. It is impossible for there to be more than one correct return; again. It is impossible for there to be more than one correct return; and in the nature of the case it is next to impossible that there can be two returns from the same body of men. Inasmuch as they have to act on one particular day; in broad daylight, and sign their names to what they do, in the nature of the case, I do not say it is impossible, but it is next to impossible, that there can be two returns from the same body of men in the State of Massachusetts or the State of Oregon claiming to be the electors. Then I say this provision can in practice have no possible application to any other case except where two sets of men in Massachusetts claim to be each one of them ap-pointed electors, and those two sets meet together at the capital of the State, and each one of them goes through with precisely the same form, voting for different men, and send up their votes; so that when they come to the President of the Senate, on the papers themselves there is nothing to guide him to determine which of them is correct and

Mr. MITCHELL. Now in that case, do I understand the Senator to say that it is the duty of the President of the Senate under the Constitution to determine which is the correct one?

Mr. DAWES. I did say a moment ago that that was a case for which no provision had been made, and that was a danger upon which which no provision had been made, and that was a danger upon which we were drifting, and that I had hoped that, warned as we had been that such a contingency not only was possible but was almost probable, some provision would come from this committee. I said I had been disappointed in that hope. I said so because I stated that all the provision for such a case which they have made in this bill is that these two sets of certificates (the right or the wrong of which lies in a question of fact deep down among the complications and passions and frauds that exist in the State itself, which the Constitution has clothed with the power, and which along it has clothed with the and tradus that exist in the State itself, which the Constitution has clothed with the power, and which alone it has clothed with the power of making the appointment) shall be opened and laid before the two Houses, and that the decision upon them shall be made by a vote of the two Houses, and it provides by law that it shall be done in two hours, and decided without any evidence upon the question of fact. I regretted to be compelled to say that that was an attempt to stifle with the palm of a man's hand the crater of a volcano.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not like to interrupt my friend, but I wish to ask him one other question. I am a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and trying to assist in this matter. What I want to know is whether the Senator means to be understood now as contending that there is no power in Congress under the Constitution to provide a means of determining as to which is the right certificate in a case of that kind, or whether the President of the Senate is compelled, under the plain provision of the Constitution, to determine it for himself?

Mr. DAWES. I am sorry, Mr. President, to be compelled to agree with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] on that point. I do not think the framers of the Constitution foresaw that when they clothed the State with the power i'self to appoint the electors a contingency would ever arise where the State would fail to see to it that its appointment was so certain and so verified that no question could ever arise about it. Inasmuch as the State appoints, the State must determine whether the State has appointed or not; the State must determine whether it has performed its duty in the absence of any constitutional provision.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to call his attention to the questions that I think are involved in his argument?

Mr. DAWES. I am after light, nothing more.

Mr. MORTON. In a case where there are two sets of electors—take the case of Rhode Island during the Dorr trouble there; suppose a presidential election had occurred at that precise time and there were two sets of electors, one certified by the governor under the old charter government and the other certified by Governor Dorr under the Dorr government, and those two certificates or packages came here sealed. In order to settle which set of electors is to be counted in the vote it must be determined which is the government of Rhode Island, the Dorr government or the charter government. I suggest to the Senator whether that question under the Constitution of the United States must not be decided by Congress in such a case as that?

One other question in regard to what must be done in such a case.

Where there are two sets of electors and there are two packages, of where there are two sets of electors and there are two packages, or course the President of the Senate cannot, without some outside information, determine which is the proper certificate until he opens them. I understand the Senator to say that to determine on the face of these papers is simply to put the hand on the crater of a volcano; but the question goes back to which set of electors was chosen by the people or by the State. I want to call my friend's attention to this proposition, that the Constitution admits of no time for that investigation. vestigation.

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

There is no period of time in which you can go back into a State and inquire who was actually elected. And then further on it provides that when these votes are thus counted, if no one person has a majority of all the electors appointed, the House of Representatives shall immediately proceed to the election; so that there shall be no interregnum, there is no pause in the proceedings until a President is chosen either by the votes of the electors or the vote of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DAWES. The remarks of the Senator from Indiana are but in corroboration of the reply that I made to the Senator from Oregon, that the provisions of the Constitution fail to meet the case of a contest upon a question of fact. Those points that the Senator from Indiana has called my attention to are but anticipating what I was going to say in a few moments.

The very fact that they are "then" to be counted, and as they appear then in that constitutional presence and nowhere else, shows that you have no more power to take them out of that presence before they are counted and submit them to the Supreme Court or to a court of arbitration than you have to submit them to a synod of Presbyterian ministers. The presence in which they are to be counted is fixed by the Constitution itself; and whether they are to be counted fixed by the Constitution itself; and whether they are to be counted by the President of the Senate or to be counted by the Senate and House of Representatives, they are to be counted "then," in that presence, and "then" means at that time, and "immediately" thereafter, if the electors shall have failed to make a choice, the House of Representatives by States is to make the choice. Thus it appears that the Constitution has provided no method, has left no opportunity, if I may use that phrase, for a contest upon a question of fact; and the committee, recognizing that fact, has provided for a method of determining it by smothering the fact. When two distinct certificates come up here to the President of the Senate, from two distinct and separate sets of electors in the State of Massachusetts, each one of them claiming to be the true board appointed by the State, there is no provision, no opportunity, no method pointed out by the Constitu-tion to determine that question of fact, and the Senator proposes, instead thereof, to take these two certificates, and on their face submit them to a two hours' deliberation in the two branches of Congress, and smother the voice of the State by the decision of those two branches Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? In the present state of the Constitution can we make any further provision than that?

Mr. DAWES. I was going to say, and had almost said it before the Senator interrupted me, that the fact that there is no other provision in the Constitution to meet this question, does not relieve us from the necessity, when there is a provision for amending the Constitution, of meeting the question.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator then allow me to suggest to him that the joint rule of the two Houses which has existed up to this session has been repealed, and that before any provision for an amendment to the Constitution can transpire a presidential election must intervene; so that if this bill is not passed, there will be the mere naked provision of the Constitution of the United States, and that would certainly leave us in a most unfortunate condition.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Minnesota will indulge me, I will endeavor to state just what I think will be the result when we get through and pass this bill; and I propose to vote for it. My objection to the bill is that, as I said in the beginning, it is a delusion;

it purports to accomplish what it does not accomplish; it leads the b purports to accomplish what it does not accomplish; it leads the people of this country into a snare because it leads them to think Congress has provided—

Mr. MORTON. If my friend will permit me a moment, as I am also in pursuit of light, I want to ask him a question. The twenty-second joint rule has been abolished. We have no rule. Suppose we fail to pass any law, and when we count the presidential vote less than a year hence there are from the State of Louisiana, if you please, two packages of electoral votes, each purporting to be certified to by two packages of electoral votes, each purporting to be certified to by a governor of that State and each bearing the fac simile of the seal of the State, so that you cannot tell by inspection which is the genuine and which is the false. I ask my friend, if we do not pass this bill and we have no rule, who is to determine the question between those two sets of votes? How is the question to be settled? Are you to cast aside both, or are you to count one? And if you are to count one, who is to select the one to be counted?

I would further add that the one is to be counted which is certified to by the governor of the State of Louisiana; and is not the question who is the governor or which is the government of Louisiana a proper question for the Congress of the United States to determine? Wherquestion for the Congress of the United States to determine? Wherever there is a dispute in regard to electoral votes or in regard to a Senator, is it not the proper thing for the Congress to say which is the government of a State, and, that being decided, then the votes of the electors who are certified by that governor are to be counted.

Mr. DAWES. I agree with the Senator that every disputed question which can possibly arise upon the papers themselves had better be decided by the two Houses as Houses than to be decided by the President of the Senate. But I was commenting upon the utter impossibility of deciding the question under the form or, without meaning any offense, under the pretext of deciding it by deciding upon the face of the paper where the question lies deeper than all that, and I was showing that that question, from the very provisions that I have was showing that that question, from the very provisions that I have discussed, there is as yet no provision of the Constitution to settle; and an act of Congress only deludes the people by giving them the idea that it is settled when in point of fact it is not.

But the third section, the Senator will allow me to say, is the most curious section that ever I saw in a statute. It proposes to determine the rule of deliberation in the two Houses of Congress by an act of

Mr. MORTON. Before my friend passes to the other point, will he allow me—

Mr. DAWES. I wish to say but a few words more. The third section declares:

That when the two Houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, or for the decision of any other question pertinent thereto, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question ten minutes, and not oftener than once: Provided, That after such debate has lasted two hours, it shall be in the power of a majority of each House to direct that the main question shall be put without further debate.

Mr. MORTON. Before my friend passes to the third section-and I shall be glad to hear him on that question—I ask him if the two Houses are not to settle the question between the two sets of electors in the case supposed, who is to settle it, and how is it to be settled? What would my friend do in that case? If we do not pass the bill and authorize the two Houses to settle the question, how is the question to be settled between two sets of electors?

and authorize the two Houses to settle the question, how is the question to be settled between two sets of electors?

Mr. DAWES. I never would content myself with doing what is in this bill, and I never would fancy that I had done my duty as a legislator if I stopped with the provisions of this bill. That this bill is better than none I have said, and that is why I shall vote for it. That it is all that can be done without an amendment to the Constitution, I have not disposition to deny. I have not found fault with it, and I have not criticised this measure in any such spirit as that. I have listened with entire sincerity to see if it were possible by an act of Congress to meet the exigency; and having deliberated in another committee a good deal upon that question, I did hope that this committee would solve that question; but they have not done it, and that was the burden of my talk. That they could do anything better than this, I am not prepared to say.

was the burden of my talk. That they could do anything better than this, I am not prepared to say.

Now the Senator will permit me to ask him what binding force as a rule upon the Senate or the House of Representatives this act of Congress can possibly have, if either desires to change it, when the Constitution itself says in so many words that each House may determine the rules of its proceedings itself, without the consent of the other House and of the Executive? That this may be treated as a walk of the Senator of the House instruction as the Senator of the other House and of the Executive ! That this may be treated as a rule of the Senate or of the House just so long as the Senate or the House is willing so to do, I will admit. It may be said that by passing this bill the Senate consents itself and the House consents itself to this law as its rule. That may be true; but the moment either wants to change it, it will have the power to change it without regard to this law. If, when the Houses are deliberating upon a question of this sort they choose to deliberate three hours, there is nothing in this law in the way, and it would not be a violation of this law, because this law is an attempt to exercise an authority over which because this law is an attempt to exercise an authority over which the Constitution says the body itself is supreme; and therefore this section, in the interest of dispatch, in the interest of necessity, as the Constitution now exists, is a mere rope of sand, and the Senate can do away with it or the House do away with it at its pleasure. It is as idle to enact what shall be the rule of this body and of the House of Representatives by a statute as it is to enact what shall be the

The Senator has pressed upon me the question, what shall we do? I say, meet it fairly and squarely; bring forward some measure for an amendment of the Constitution upon a subject which the framers of the Constitution did not think there was any necessity for amending, but which subsequent experience has shown is vital and essential. But while such an amendment is pending and until it becomes a part of the organic law I shall vote for this bill; but I shall vote for it believing that, just so far as it follows the rules that existed before the twenty-second joint rule, it is but providing the uniform usage, and that the moment it goes beyond that it is only advisory and has no sort of binding force; and it is in vain for us to tell the people that we have met the peril, for the peril exists precisely under this bill as it existed before the twenty-second joint rule and when nothing but the usage under the Constitution was the guide of the two Houses.

Mr. MAXEY obtained the floor.
Mr. LOGAN. It is getting late, and if the Senator will give way I will move an executive session.

Mr. MAXEY. I am satisfied. I do not care to proceed at this late hour

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS.) Before submitting the question the Chair will lay before the Senate some bills from the House of Representatives for reference, with the consent of the mover. Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following action of the House of Representatives:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 15, 1876.

Resolved, That the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that that be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

MINERAL LANDS IN MISSOURI AND KANSAS.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill (H. R. No. 1251) to exclude the State of Missouri from the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872.

On motion of Mr. SARGENT, it was Resolved. That the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the said bill, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the managers on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

Mr. SARGENT, Mr. COCKRELL, and Mr. HARVEY were appointed the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LOGAN. I renew my motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. MONDAY, March 20, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING THE SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BEEBE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

TAX ON WHISKY.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of distillers, rectifiers, and wholesale liquor-dealers of Cincinnati and Hamilton, Ohio; Covington, Alexandria, and Louisville, Kentucky; Lawrenceburgh and Aurora, Indiana; and Peoria, Illinois, requesting Congress to determine at an early day any change of the rate of tax on whisky, because both the interest of the trade and the revenue demand it, and protesting against any change in the present plan of collecting the tax; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and

PROTEST AGAINST CHANGE OF TAX ON SPIRITS.

Mr. SAYLER, by unanimous consent, presented the protest of Charles Hoeffer and 19 other distillers and rectifiers of Cincinnati, Ohio, against any change in the revenue law fixing the amount of tax on spirits; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM WELSH, LATE OF TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the Adjutant-General containing the military history of Captain William Welsh, late of the Twenty-lifth Infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BREAKWATER AT SAN LUIS OBISPO, CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the Chief of Engineers upon House resolution No. 139 to authorize the construction of a breakwater at San Luis Obispo, California; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ENLISTED MEN AS ARMY OFFICERS' SERVANTS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from Major Henry M. Lazelle on the subject of the employment of enlisted men as servants of officers of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

VIENNA EXPOSITION.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

tion; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to communicate to this House the report of the special commission appointed to supervise the commission to the Vienna exposition, together with the correspondence of Mr. Jay, late minister to Austria, with the chief commissioner and with the Department of State, on the subject of the American department, together with such other papers and accounts relating to that business as may be necessary for a complete understanding thereof; and that the Secretary of State be further requested to advise the House what papers and reports connected with the Vienna exposition are now preparing for publication under the direction of the Department, and what amount, if any, remains unexpended of the $200,000 appropriated by Congress for the representation of the United States at the Vienna exposition.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the recolution

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARD. I now ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the memorial upon which that resolution is founded.

There was no objection; and the resolution was ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives:

The petition of John Jay, late minister to Austria and member of the special commission of investigation appointed by the President to supervise the American commission to Vienna; of Thomas McElrath, a member of the original commission, a member also of the special commission of investigation, and subsequently charged with the closing of the American department and the returning the goods of exhibitors; of Colonel LeGrand B. Cannon, a member of the temporary commission appointed by the President to the charge of the American department after the suspension of the original commission; of Theodore-Roosevelt, the only other member of the said temporary commission now in the country—the third member, Charles F. Spang, being absent in Europe; of Jackson S. Schultz, for some time chief commissioner in the charge of the American department, succeeding Colonel Cannon and his associates; and of H. Garretson, who succeeded Mr. Schultz as chief commissioner until the close of the exposition, respectfully pray your honorable body to call for and print the papers and accounts on file in the office of the honorable the Secretary of State relating to the management, conduct, and character of the said American department at Vienna.

The undersigned beg leave to show, in support of this petition, "that an event so unprecedented as the suspension by the President of a national commission representing in an international exposition the art, industry, science, and culture of the governmental investigation into the causes and extent of the irregularities demanding the suspension has not been made known, excepting by exparts statements and mutilated extracts, which have not enabled the country to judge where lay the responsibility for this national disaster; and that it seems due to the country at large, to the mass of exhibitors, and to officers of the Government concerned in the matter, including the suspended commissioners, that the entire record should be submitted to public scrutiny.

That it is believed that the accounts will show a large unexpended balance of the $200,000 appropriated by Congress for the representation of American industries at Vienna; that should it be intended to submit to Congress and the country special reports of scientists upon particular branches of the exposition, such reports, if unaccompanied by the correspondence and reports now asked for, would give no idea of the administration and operation of the American department.

And your petitioners will ever, &c.

The memorial is as follows:

MEMORIAL.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the convention assembled for the purpose of framing a constitution for the State of Colorado respectfully represents:

That the greatest attention ought to be directed to the preservation and care of those resources upon which the welfare of the people depends. This principle finds an especial application with us as far as our forests are concerned. With the exception of our mountain regions, but little timber is met with anywhere in Colorado. But along the creeks and rivers which cross our prairies we may find now and then a small spot covered with scattered trees and short, useless undergrowth. Our mountains alone contain forests worth the while to be mentioned and considered. But even these, except some valleys, where, indeed, beautiful forests are yet growing, present an alarming spectacle to the close observer. The slopes, ridges, and higher plateans of the mountains contain but few trees, generally short and twisted from their constant exposure to strong winds. The higher regions, of course, are bare on account of their great clevation. Only the more protected portions of the mountainous portion of Colorado, as far as we can estimate from the best topographical maps and our own knowledge, amounts to about 15,000,000 acres. Of these, 30 per cent. to contain about twenty-five cords of wood per acre and 10 per cent. unobjectionable forests. But the rapid increase of our population; the spread of industries, the building of extensive railroads, the reckless devastation of timber in cutting and transporting it, and the frequent fires—mostly caused by carelessness and often raging for months—threaten soon to destroy our forests and expose us to the danger of a wood famine, if some effectual means are not employed to check a further destruction and to remedy, as far as possible, the damage already done. The consequences of such a calamity would be severely felt; thousands of laborers would be thrown out of employment who had made a living in cutting, transporting, and working up the products of o evil a which still increase the mischif. Those are produced by losing the beneficial missaces of our frozens upon librates and vegetation. A forest, or larger samples of trees and bushes growing rather in close preximity, is, to say, a magazine of missture, from which the attemptone piece is constantly supplied with this commodity, can et all you concluded by stating that experiments have shown that a single full-ther, regular forests keep the sell in which their stay to private the provided of the provid to put the respective forests and waste forest grounds of all those regions where irrigation has to be used for agricultural purposes under the control of the respective territorial or State governments.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. NEAL. I call for the regular order of business. The SPEAKER. This being the third Monday of the month, the regular order is the consideration of business reported from the Com-regular order is the consideration of business reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise a question of consideration. My object is to allow the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] to submit another proposition in connection with the repeal of the resumption act.

Mr. FORT. We do not want anything more on that subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

The third Monday of each month, from the hour of two o'clock p. m. until the adjournment of that day, shall, when claimed by the Committee for the District of Columbia, be devoted exclusively to business reported from said committee, and said committee shall henceforth be omitted by the Speaker in the regular call of committees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds upon the imperative language of this rule that the question of consideration cannot be taken against this committee on its demand for the regular order. Their right under the rule is absolute and cannot be interfered with by motions to suspend the rules. The Chair desires to say that any other ruling would have the practical effect of denying to the Committee for the District of Columbia any hearing in this House, because it would be practicable for gentlemen on the floor of the House during Mondays to consume the entire day by motions to suspend the rules. The Chair holds that the right of the Committee for the District of Columbia is clear, and that they alone can surrender it.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman from Ohio in charge of the Committee for the District of Columbia [Mr. Neal] to allow the gentleman from the Cleveland district [Mr. PAYNE] to submit his

Mr. NEAL. I would like to accommodate my friend, but I cannot in justice do so. The Committee for the District of Columbia is now ready to report more bills than we shall probably be able to dispose of during the balance of the day.

Mr. RANDALL. That is rather a snap judgment to take of the House. We will have to wait until the time when the District Committee shall have disposed of their business, and then we can have an opportunity to vote upon the proposition. I regret that the gentleman from Ohio does not see the propriety of allowing the proposition to be submitted and voted upon now.

Mr. FORT and Mr. HOAR called for the regular order of business. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] is entitled to the floor.

ANACOSTIA AND POTOMAC RIVER RAILROAD.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, without amendment and with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (S. No. 295) to amend the act entitled "An act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, and to regulate its construction and operation."

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The first section of the bill provides that section 2 of the act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomae River Railroad, approved February 18, 1875, be, and is hereby, so amended as to extend the time for the completion of said road to six months from and after the completion of the streets now in process of improvement along and upon which the chartered rights of the company extend.

The second section grants the company the privilege of changing their terminus at Fourteenth street and Pennsylvania avenue west, as follows: Commencing at intersection of Twelfth street and Ohio avenue northwest, along and upon Twelfth to D street, along and upon D street to Fifteenth street, along and upon Fifteenth street west to Pennsylvania avenue, near the Treasury gates, being one square west of the present terminus; also, that the company may extend their road from the intersection of Twelfth street and Ohio avenue northwest, along and upon Louisiana avenue to the south side of Pennsylvania avenue at a point opposite Center Market; provided that whenever the street pavement may be torn up and travel thereon interfered with by removal of the track of said road said company shall, at its own expense, put such street pavement in as good order as before the laying of the track thereon.

The third section provides that Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal the act.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a point of order against this bill.
Mr. NEAL. I hope the gentleman will state his point of order.
Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order that the Supreme Court of the United States have declared that the streets in this city belong to the Government, and this bill proposes to dispose of them for a certain purpos

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, because the Chair cannot hold it is his duty to construe the laws or the public decisions of the courts.

Mr. RANDALL. That decision has already been rendered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not supposed to take cognizance of all the judicial decisions of the country, and to attempt to execute them from this chair against the wish of the House. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. NEAL. The act of which this is amendatory passed Congress on the 15th of February, 1875. The amendments proposed are three in number. The first simply extends the time for the completion of the road for six months from and after the completion of the streets now in process of improvement along which this road is to extend and has previously been located. The second amendment simply changes the western terminus of the road, and provides that the road shall pass from the intersection of Twelfth street and Ohio avenue northwest, along and upon Twelfth to D street, along and upon D street to Fif-teenth street, and upon Fifteenth street to the west side of Pennsylvania avenue, near the Treasury gates, being one square west of the present terminus. The third amendment simply gives this company the right to extend its road from the intersection of Twelfth street and Ohio avenue northwest along and upon Lonisiana avenue to a point opposite Center Market, south of Pennsylvania avenue.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NEAL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECORDING DEEDS AND MORTGAGES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CRAPO, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back without amendment, and with a unanimous recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1922) providing for the recording of deeds, mortgages, and other convoyances affecting real estate in the District of Columbia.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read third time.

The bill was read. It provides that sections 446 and 447 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia be repealed, and the following enacted in lieu thereof:

All deeds, deeds of trust, mortgages, conveyances, covenants, agreements, or any instrument of writing which by law is entitled to be recorded in the office of the recorder of deeds, shall take effect and be valid, as to creditors and as to subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, from the time when such deed, deed of trust, mortgage, conveyance, covenant, agreement, or instrument in writing shall have been acknowledged, proved, or certified, as the case may be, and delivered to the recorder of deeds for record, and from that time only.

Mr. CRAPO. I will state very briefly the changes which the passage of this bill will make in the existing law. By the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia it is now provided that all deeds of trust and mortgages shall take effect and be valid as to subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, and as to all creditors, from the time when such deeds of trust or mortgages are delivered to the recorder of deeds for record. But all other deeds and conveyances of real estate and instruments of writing which deeds and conveyances of real estate and instruments of writing which by law are entitled to record, if they are delivered to the recorder of deeds within six months from the date of their scaling and delivery are valid and take effect as against all persons at the date of their acknowledgment, and not at the date of their being filed for record. That is, a person negotiating for the purchase of real estate in this District may, after a careful examination of the records, find that the record title is in the party with whom he is dealing; may pay the purchase-money, take the deed, and place it on record; and at any time within six months his title may be defeated by another deed prior in date of execution but subsequent in time of record.

The legislation proposed in this bill is similar to that in force in nearly all, if not all, of the States of the Union. Its effect will be to facilitate the sale and transfer of real estate in the District, to protect innocent purchasers who rely upon the record title, and to restrain dishonest persons from fraudulent conveyances. It puts restrain dishonest persons from fraudulent conveyances. It puts conveyances in fee upon the same footing that mortgages now are. I think there can be no objection to the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

COLUMBIA RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HENDEE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 1271) amendatory of the act to incorporate the Columbia Railway Company of the District of Columbia, approved May 24, 1871.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act to incorporate the Columbia Railway Company of the District of Columbia, approved May 24, 1871, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to extend the rights under said charter giving the said company the right and power to lay down a single or double track railway, with the necessary switches and turn-outs, on, through, and along the following avenues, streets, and highways in the city and county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, subject to all the provisions and regulations of the original charter and amendments thereto, commencing at the eastern terminus of Maryland avenue westwardly to its intersection with North B street; thence along Morth B street to its intersection with North B street; thence along North B street to its intersection with the right to run public carriages thereon drawn by horse-power.

The amendments reported by the committee were as follows:

Strike out section 2.
Add to section 4 the following:
The amount to be contributed to be ascertained, when the companies disagree, by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, upon application of any company interested, and on notice to, and hearing of, the parties interested.

Mr. HENDEE. I desire to say in explanation of this bill that it provides merely for an extension of the route of what is now known as the H street or New York avenue railway. That company has already built a road under an old charter, granted, I think, in 1870, from a point near the Treasury Department through part of New York avenue, K street, and Massachusetts avenue, thence, by way of the Government Printing Office, to the eastern boundary of the city. This bill proposes to allow the company to build a track from the eastern boundary through Maryland avenue to a point on North Capitol street very near the Capitol; thence down that street to a junction with its present track at the Government Printing Office. The object is simply to allow people living on New York avenue, Massachusetts avenue, K street, and in the sections of the city contiguous to those streets, to come directly to the Capitol and return by means of these streets, to come directly to the Capitol and return by means of these cars. The amount fixed for the fare is five cents.

That portion of the bill which allows the company to build a branch from the Government Printing Office, or from H and North Capitol streets, to the Old Soldiers' Home, we propose by the amendments to strike out; so that the bill will only empower the company to do what I have already stated. It is thought to be in the interest of the people, especially those living in the vicinity of New York avenue, Massachusetts avenue, and K street. The avenues and streets through which this extension of the road is to asso are very wide. through which this extension of the road is to pass are very wide; and this measure can be no detriment to public travel in any manner.

Mr. MAISH. As I understand this bill, the company will have the right to use such motive power as the District authorities may ap-

Mr. HENDEE. The section containing that provision is to be struck out by the amendments we offer; so that the company will have the right to use nothing but horse-power.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

CONSTABLES AND MARSHALS.

Mr. HENDEE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back with amendments a bill (H. R. No. 1256) to regulate the duties of constables and marshals in the District of Columbia where property is claimed to be exempt from execution.

The bill was read, as follows:

where property is claimed to be exempt from execution.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in the District of Columbia, from and after the passage of this act, it shall be the duty of the marshal or constable, as the case may be, where an execution or attachment against the property of a judgment debtor is placed in his hands for execution and the judgment debtor claims that has no property save that exempted by law, to select a jury of three responsible persons of the neighborhood, who shall first be sworn by the marshal or constable to well and truly perform the duty of taking an inventory and appraisement of the judgment debtor's property; and the marshal or constable, with the jury, shall proceed to take an inventory of the property of the judgment debtor and appraise it at a cash valuation.

If the jury shall find that the judgment debtor has more property than is, in their judgment, exempt by law, they shall certify upon the inventory and appraisement the amount over and above the legal exemption; and this amount only, as certified to by the jury to be over and above the legal exemption, shall be liable to attachment or execution. And where a jury finds that a judgment debtor has more property than is legally exempt and so certify, the debtor shall have the privilege of choosing what article or articles or piece or pieces of property shall be levied upon under the attachment or execution. If the jury shall find that the judgment debtor has none property than is, in their judgment, legally exempt, they shall so certify upon the inventory, and state the amount of it. If the jury see fit, they may question the debtor as to his property.

The judgment debtor shall afford the jury ample opportunity to make their investigation, and shall truly answer all their questions in relation to his property. The jurors and the marshal or constable shall receive from the judgment debtor, for their services in this connection, $1 each; which sum, if not paid in ten days after the inventory and apprais

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

Section 1, line 29, insert after the word "debtor" the words "and any other

In line 30, after the word "property," insert the words "of the debtor, and said marshal or constable may administer the proper oath to the debtor or persons to be examined."

De examined."

In lines 44 and 45 strike out the words "and the debtor's property is appraised at less than $150," and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "and if said jury shall certify that the debtor has no property liable to attachment or to be taken

In line 46, insert after the words "judgment creditor" the following words: "but if said jury shall certify that such debtor has property liable to attachment or to be taken on execution, then the costs of such investigations shall be paid by the judgment debtor."

Mr. HENDEE. Mr. Speaker, perhaps a statement in regard to this matter is necessary. We have found in our investigation that it is a matter of difficulty on the part of officers of this District having charge of the collection of debts, or service of writs of attachment or execution, to find among a great mass of people property upon which to satisfy those debts. They are evaded and eluded, and the property is secreted, and at the present time there is no law which compels a debtor or any other person to give any information as to his property, whether he has any liable to attachment or not.

Now, in this District there are various articles and kinds of articles are the stronger than the second of the second of exempt from attachment and levy of execution. I wish to call the attention of the House not fully but partially to them. By section 797 of the laws of the District of Columbia as revised the following articles are exempt from attachment; I will not read the whole of them: First, all wearing apparel belonging to the persons and all heads of families; second, beds, bedding, household furniture, stoves, &c., to the amount of $300; third, provisions for three months' support, whether provided or growing; fourth, fuel for three months; fifth, mechanics' tools and instruments of trade or business amounting to $200 in value, with $200 worth of stock, &c.; sixth, libraries and implements of a professional man or artist to the value of $300; seventh, one horse, mule, or yoke of oxen, one cart, dray, or wagon for said team; eighth, farming utensils, with food for such team, &c., to the value of $100, family effects to the amount of $400, one cow, swine, and six sheep. Other articles are also exempt from

It will be seen in all these different kinds of property exempt from attachment there is a certain limit in dollars beyond which the debtor is not entitled to his property as against execution or attachment. Now, there is no law in this District by which it can be ascertained whether the debtor has more or less than the law gives him of any particular class of property which is exempt from attachment; and it has been thought prudent and proper—and I think that something like this is the law of many of the States of the Union—to pass a law like that which we have proposed. It is simply this: that where an officer has in his possession a writ of attachment or execution for levy upon property of any debtor and the judgment debtor shall demand a jury, that jury shall be furnished him by the marshal or officer having the paper for levy of three persons of the neighborhood, who shall be sworn to the faithful discharge of their duty; and they shall then put the debtor and such other persons as they see fit on oath to determine the question whether in any one of the classes of property exempt from attachment the party has more than the law allows him. If they find he has in a particular class more than is exempt under the statutes of the District they shall so certify to the officer, and the balance of the property will then as a matter of course be subject to levy or attachment, giving to the debtor the right to choose what articles he shall submit to attachment or levy of execuchoose what articles he shall submit to attachment or levy of execution. In case the judgment debtor shall demand a jury to determine whether he has property not subject to attachment and shall succeed in showing to the jury he has no property subject to attachment, the costs of that investigation are to be paid by the judgment creditor. If it shall be determined when the judgment debtor asks for the hearing that he has property in either class liable to attachment, then the costs of that investigation are to be paid by the judgment debtor. It is opening up to the creditors doing business in this District a fair and conitable means by which they can get at property in this District. equitable means by which they can get at property in this District liable to attachment, thereby securing to them the payment of their honest debts. The committee was unanimous on this question. We really think the abuses practiced in this District for a great many years will be cured by this legislation. I move the amendments be

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sympson, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 591) to regulate the transfer of bonded merchandise withdrawn from warehouse; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for certain Indians.

CITIZENS' RAILROAD.

Mr. HENDEE also, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1652) giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Citizens' Railroad, and to regulate its construction and operation, with the recom-mendation that it do pass.

The first section of the bill provides that the approval and sanction

The first section of the bill provides that the approval and sanction of Congress be given to the construction, operation, and maintenance of a single or double track street-railroad by the Citizens' Railroad Company of Washington City, District of Columbia, a company incorporated in accordance with chapter 18 of the Revised Statutes of the United States applicable to the District of Columbia, which incorporation is confirmed and validated, along, upon, and over the following route in the city and county of Washington, District of Columbia, namely: Commencing at the intersection of Louisiana avenue and Seventh streets porthwest in the city of Washington: theree along Seventh streets northwest, in the city of Washington; thence along and upon Louisiana avenue to Sixth street west; thence along and and upon said Sixth street west to Gixth street west; thence along and upon said Sixth street west to Gixthe street north; thence upon and along said G street to Fifth street west; thence along and upon said Fifth street to Boundary street; thence along and upon Boundary street to Larch street, in the county of Washington; thence along and upon said Larch street to Elm street; thence along and upon said Elm street to Four and-a-half street; thence along and upon said Four-and-a-half street to College street; thence along and upon said College street to the valley east of Howard University; and thence by the most practicable route to the southern or Harewood entrance to the Soldiers' Home; with a branch leaving the main line at the intersection of Fifth street and New York avenue northwest, and proceeding along and upon said New York avenue to North Capitol street; and thence along and upon said North Capitol street and its extension known as Lincoln avenue to Glenwood Cemetery.

The second section of the bill provides that whenever the foregoing route shall coincide with the route of any other duly incorporated railroad company or connect portions of such route, but one set of tracks shall be used, and each company using the tracks shall contribute equitably to the expense of laying and maintaining them; the amount so to be contributed to be ascertained, when the companies disagree, by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, upon application of any company interested and on notice to and hearing of the parties interested.

The third section of the bill provides that this company shall construct at least a single track over their route within six months from the approval of this act, under penalty of forfeiture of this grant.

The fourth section provides that in the manner of laying its tracks and paving the same this company shall be under the control of the executive authority of the District of Columbia, and it shall pave its tracks and the spaces between them and for the space of two feet beyond the outer line thereof and keep the same in good order without expense to the United States or the District of Columbia; and that said pavements shall be as prescribed by the said executive authority of the District of Columbia; and the rate of fare charged and received by said company shall not exceed five cents a passenger for any dis-tance between the termini of said road.

The fifth section provides that Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. HENDEE. I will detain the House but a moment in explanation of this bill. It has been looked upon by the committee as one of more merit perhaps than usually attaches to bills of this character. This company has already been authorized under the general law, and now seeks only from Congress to be allowed to construct the road, Congress having reserved to itself the power to determine the route which any road shall take in this District. This bill is to authorize the company to do so.

It authorizes the construction of a road to be operated by horsepower from a point near the junction of the Seventh-street railway and the Avenue railway on Louisiana avenue; to run upon that avenue to Sixth street west; thence along Sixth street to G street north; thence along G street to Fifth street west; thence along Fifth street to Boundary street, which is the northern boundary of the city; thence along some short streets there to Le Droit Park; and thence to the Soldiers' Home; with power to build a branch to Glenwood Cemetery.

The object of the bill is to furnish the citizens residing on Le Droit

Park and in that portion of the city and District communication with the heart of the city of Washington. They are now comparatively without conveniences in the way of travel by horse railways. It also allows the building of the road through Le Droit Park, which is owned by private citizens, and who are the gentlemen in interest largely in this bill and those to the Soldier Heart I think it will largely in this bill, and thence to the Soldiers' Home. I think it will be a great convenience to the people of the District of Columbia or the city of Washington, and to all parties who may visit the city and who desire to go to the Soldiers' Home and also to Glenwood Cemetery. I would say that there is no railway now to Glenwood Cemetery, and it seems quite proper that one should be built. It will enhance the value of the property of Le Droit Park. It will also largely enhance the value of the property in Fifth street and other sections of the city which it traverses; and this, as a matter of course, is of great benefit to the city, because as you enhance the value of real estate in the city, that real estate pays more of the taxes and other expenses of the city and District government.

I think upon this statement there can be no objection to the bill. The fare to be asked for passage over this road is only five cents, and it is a road extending some distance, and is to be built mainly and almost entirely by the people who own the Le Droit Park and the people who live on Fifth street and other streets near it. I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I noticed in the reading of a former bill, which was considered by the House earlier in the day, an expression that the cars might be propelled by horse-power "or any noiseless force." I do not think that that expression is in this bill, but I have not understood with certainty whether it is in the bill or not. It occurred to me that if that expression were construed to authorize steam-cars it might be productive of serious inconvenience. I ask the gentleman whether it is in the bill ?

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania. I ask that the bill may be reported again.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before the bill is again reported I would also ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] whether the committee have had in view existing roads to see whether the streets are not now being encumbered with more railroads than the city needs? This road, so far as I have been able to follow its route from the reading of the bill, seems an important one, and I think the bill ought to pass. But I should be sorry to see the use of steam authorized on the city railroads by any terms that might be so construed without our designing it.

Mr. HENDEE. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio I would say that this road is designated in the bill simply as a street railway. I do not think that under the terms of the bill the company would be a street railway. allowed to use any other power than horse-power. But for the purpose of settling that question I would propose to add to the end of section 1 the words, "to be operated by horse-power only." that amendment

Mr. GARFIELD. Now as to the other point. Will the gentleman state whether this road runs parallel to any other leading road?

Mr. HENDEE. In answer to that question I will say that it does necessarily run parallel to other roads in the same way as the F street railroad runs parallel to the Avenue railroad.

Mr. GARFIELD. But not very near?

Mr. HENDEE. Not very near. The nearest are the Seventh street road, and the Capitol and North O street road on the other side. One passes north and south upon Third street and the other upon Seventh street. The termini are quite distant from each other, and this runs midway upon Fifth street, and is no nearer to the other roads and I think not quite as near as the Ninth and Seventh street roads are now. And the Ninth and Eleventh street lines are, I think, nearer than this road is to any road that runs in the same direction.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman also allow me to ask him in this connection whether the chariot line is a chartered institution?

Mr. HENDEE. I understand that this is a private institution;

Mr. HENDEE. I understand that this is a private institution of the standard of inventions that would save the necessity of cutting up the streets of the city with railroad tracks, but I do not know about that.

The question was taken on Mr. HENDEE's amendment, and it was

CITIZENS' BUILDING COMPANY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. HARDENBERGH, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back a bill (S. No. 401) to incorporate the Citizens' Building Company of Washington with a favorabe recommendation. The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That John C. McKelden, T. L. Tullock, B. F. Bigelow, Samuel Emery, M. Ashford, Frank M. Green, J. G. Judd, E. G. Davis, John Fraser, B. F. Fuller, Charles Bradley, C. C. Duncanson, W. B. Morgan, and their associates, are hereby created a body politic and corporate by the name of "The Citizens' Building Company of Washington City," and as such may purchase, hold, and convey real and personal estate, make contracts, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, may have a corporate seal, and may exercise all other powers incident to corporations and usually enjoyed by them, and such especially as are requisite to enable them to purchase, take, hold, and convey square 363, in Washington City, District of Columbia, and to improve the same by building dwelling-houses thereon, and to sell and convey them to stockholders or others, for the benefit of the stockholders: Provided, That the capital stock of the said company shall not exceed $300,000.

holders: Provided, That the capital stock of the said company shall not exceed $300,000.

SEC. 2. That the first meeting of said company shall be holden at the time and place at which a majority of the persons hereinbefore named shall assemble for that purpose, and five days' notice of such meeting shall be given each of said corporators; at which meeting, and at all annual meetings, and at all meetings specially called for that object, said company may adopt or amend a constitution, and enact, amend, or repeal by-laws regulating the affairs of said company, prescribing the number, character, and duties of their officers, and the manner of their election, and providing in all things for the management of the affairs of said company, or for securing its interests and welfare.

SEC. 3. That the powers of this corporation shall vest in a board of directors. who shall be chosen as provided by the company's constitution or by-laws, and shall consist of thirteen persons, and shall have perpetual succession, each one holding his office until his successor is chosen and qualified: Provided, That until an election by the stockholders of said company shall be had in accordance with the constitution and by-laws of said company, the persons hereinbefore named shall constitute the board of directors of said company.

SEC. 4. Mr. HARDENBERGH. The purpose of the bill is a very plain and simple one. A number of persons have aggregated their capital together in a building association and purchased a square of land. The simple purpose of this bill is to give them an act of incorporation whereby they can join their funds together and proceed to the erection of buildings upon the square. There is no general law in the District which admits of acts of incorporation, and therefore this bill is asked for and is reported by the manimous consent of the comis asked for and is reported by the unanimous consent of the com-

INEBRIATE ASYLUM, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. STEVENSON, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 359) to incorporate the Washington City Inebriate Asylum in the District of Columbia. The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

favorable recommendation, the bill (8. No. 359) to incorporate the Washington City Inebriate Asylum in the District of Columbia.

The Clerk reach the bill, as follows:

Beit enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That all persons who shall become subscribers pursuant to this act shall hereby constitute and be declared a community corporation and bodypolitic forever or until Congress by law direct this charter to cease and determine, by and under the name of the Washington City Inebriate Asylum of the District of Columbia; and by and under the same name and title they shall be able and capable in their corporate name to take, purchase, have, lease, and hold real estate, not exceeding sixty acres, in the District of Columbia, and erect thereon a building or buildings suitable for the purposes of an asylum hereinbefore named; and to take, purchase, hold, and convey such personal property as may be necessary to carry out the objects of said asylum, namely, the care and medical treatment and control of the inebriate, and for no other purpose. Said asylum shall have power to sue and be sued, to make and use a common seal and alter the same at pleasure, to take and hold any grant or devise of land, or any donation or bequest of money or other personal property to be applied to the maintenance of said asylum. But the limitation that the said asylum shall not take, purchase, have, lease, and hold real estate shall only apply to property leased or purchased, and shall not prevent the said asylum from taking and holding any estate, real or personal, given or devised to it, not exceeding in value $500,000? Provided, That the property held by the said asylum shall never exceed $500,000 in value.

Sec. 2. That any person donating the sum of $10 to the asylum hereby incorporated shall be deemed a subscriber and stockholder.

Sec. 3. That the fund of said institution shall be $50,000 but may be increased to $300,000 at any time the board of directors may think president or vice-president must be one, shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business. All committees, physicians, agents, and officers, authorized by this act, or by the by-laws of this asylum, shall be lable in his or her individual capacity for any contract, debt, or engagement of said asylum after the full amount of their subscription is paid in.

SEC. 5. That w. W. Corcoran, George H. Plant, George W. Riggs, W. W. Moore, Samuel Norment, J. W. Thompson, Matthew G. Emory, John T. Given, A. E. Perry, John C. Harkness, William Stickney, J. C. McKelden, Joseph Burrows, doctor of medicine, William J. Murtagh, Columbus Alexander, William R. Riley, D. D. Cone, Thomas Berry, George W. Stickney, J. P. Halloway, John W. Simus, E. C. Carrington, James H. Stone, Dickerson Nailor, and Joseph T. Howard, doctor of medicine, shall constitute the first board of trustees, who shall hold their offices until a new board of trustees is cleeted; and they shall be commissioners, whose duty it shall be to locate the said asylum and to receive subscriptions to the funds of said institution.

SEC. 7. That the said institution shall have power to receive any inebriate who shall voluntarily make application thereto, and retain him or her therein for such period as may be deemed advisable by the physician in charge.

SEC. 8. That any justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, upon petition or complaint, duly verified and presented by any relative of an inebriate or habitual drunkard, or by any officer of this asylum, or by any officer of police of said District of Columbia, shall proceed thereupon to appoint a commission to inquire into the case in the same manner as is directed by law in relation to the care and custody of the persons and estates of idiots, lunatics, persons of unsound mind, and drunkards, and according to the rules and practice of the said supreme court in such cases. The person charged with being an inebriate shall have notice to be present himself, or by counsel, before such commission, means of promoting the reformation of the persons employed. From the profits of such labor, if any, the actual cost of support of each incbriate may be deducted and retained by the institution, and any surplus shall be paid to his (or her) family, or, in case he (or she) have no family, to himself (or herself) or his (or her) committee, trustees, or guardian for his (or her) benefit, at the time of his (or her) discharge from the arrive Market and the property of the agreem.

in case he (or she) have no hamily, to himself (or herself) of his (or her) committee, trustees, or guardian for his (or her) benefit, at the time of his (or her) discharge from the asylum. And labor performed upon the grounds or premises of the asylum by immates thereof shall be fairly appraised, and the proceeds shall be disbursed as above provided.

SEC. 11. That no person shall sell any strong or spirituous liquors or wine or fermented liquors within the distance of one-fourth of a mile from the outward bounds of the land and premises of the said asylum hereby incorporated, and whoover shall violate the terms of this section shall forfeit $50 for each offense, and shall also be guilty of a misdeameanor: Provided, That the site or location of said asylum be not nearer than one-quarter of a mile to the corporate limits of the city of Washington.

SEC. 12. That no person shall enter or pass upon the land or premises of said asylum, other than the officers of said asylum, officers of justice, and those having business with said asylum, without a written or printed pass or permit from that officer of the asylum who may be empowered by the by-laws of said asylum to issue such pass; and any person violating the provisions of this section shall forfeit the sum of $10 and be guilty of a misdemeanor. All penalties imposed in this act shall be sued for and recovered in the name of the president of the asylum, and shall be paid to the treasurer thereof for the support of any poor persons who may be inmates of said asylum.

sued for and recovered in the name of the president of the asylum, and shall be paid to the treasurer thereof for the support of any poor persons who may be inmates of said asylum.

Sec. 13. That the superintendent of said asylum is hereby authorized to appoint two or more of the attendants and employés of said asylum as policemen, whose duty it shall be, under his order or that of the assistant superintendent, to arrest and return to the asylum such incbriates as have escaped therefrom, or any patient who shall violate any law of the asylum, or person trespassing on the grounds or premises of said asylum, contrary to the provisions of section 12 of this act.

Sec. 14. That the board of trustees of said asylum shall make an annual report at their first meeting in November of their proceedings, income, expenditures, the number of patients received, discharged, and remaining in the institution, verified by the affidavit of the president and the treasurer; which report shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior.

Sec. 15. That any State or territorial Legislature, municipal council, or authorities of the District of Columbia may provide for the maintenance in the said asylum of any number of poor patients by appropriating sufficient funds for that purpose; and any person who shall donate or leave by legacy the sum of $5,000 to the said Washington City Incbriate Asylum shall establish forever a free bed in said asylum; $2,500 shall provide a free bed in said asylum for six months in each year; the donor or legator shall have endowed, then the trustees of said asylum shall fill the said free bed with a poor patient. The said patients in said free bed; but in case the donor or legator shall have endowed, then the trustees of said asylum shall fill the said free bed with medical treatment free of charge, and like all other patients shall be subject to the rules and regulations of the said asylum.

Sec. 16. That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this charter: And provided, That no mone

Mr. STEVENSON. Before moving the previous question upon the passage of this bill, I desire to say a few words in explanation of its provisions. The importance, in fact the necessity, of this or a similar act of incorporation in this District cannot be overestimated. Institutions of a kindred character to the one sought to be founded by this bill now exist in many of the States of this Union, as well as in Canada and Great Britain; and, unless all testimony is to be disbe-lieved, have resulted in great good to the unfortunate persons for whose benefit they were founded. As will appear from the bill, the object of the asylum sought to be incorporated is the cure, medical treatment, and control of inebriates. This bill is, I think, so guarded in its terms that no practical difficulties can arise as to what persons are to be affected by its provisions. Section 9 is as follows:

That for the purposes of this act, any person who, by the use of intoxicating liquors or other intoxicants, has lost self-control or become incapable of proper attention to the care and management of his affairs, or habitually or periodically neglectful thereof, or dangerous to himself or others, shall be regarded as an inebriate or habitual drunkard.

It will be seen, sir, from the foregoing section that this asylum takes control only of those who have lost all ability or desire to control themselves. By section 10 of the act, the superintendent and others in charge of the asylum are authorized to give to such of the inebriates as are without the means of support such labor as may be adapted to their capacity and condition, and to that end workshops may be established in the institution. The profits arising from the labor of any inebriate thus employed shall go to himself or family, after deducting the actual expenses of such inebriate in the asylum. The repriety of the latter provision can hardly be too highly commended.

Upon the points of the average duration of the residence of patients in such institutions and the proportion of cures effected, Dr. Dodge, superintendent of the New York State Inebriate Asylum, stated that after a careful examination he had come to the conclusion that the average residence is four months. As in all similar institutions, some remain only a few weeks, a large proportion remain three months, a goodly number continue six months, and a few remain one year, and even longer, but the average is four months.

The proportion of cures during the past two years, for which period he had reliable data, is 40 per cent. In using the term "cured" he was not contented to put a man down as cured because he left the asylum in a state of sobriety and reasonably good health, but followed him up by correspondence with himself or his friends, and got the best information he could after being exposed to the risks and temptations of society.

Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen whose names appear in the sixth section of this bill as the first board of trustees of this institution are, as I believe, a sufficient guarantee that it will be inaugurated under auspices favorable to its usefulness and prosperity. The trustees are empowered to locate the asylum, receive subscriptions to its funds, and to take the necessary steps to carry into practical effect the provisions of this set. visions of this act.

No money is appropriated by this bill, the last section especially providing that no appropriation shall ever be made by Congress for this institution. The bill, sir, is manifestly a just one, and I trust will pass without opposition.

I ask the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REFORM SCHOOL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to offer an amendment to the bill. I move to strike out in lines 6 and 7 of section 1 the words "upon the nomination of the Attorney-General." I can hardly see the necessity of giving the President the appointing power and then obliging him to accept the nominations of the Attorney-General. This bill does not require the Attorney-General to recommend, but does require the President to appoint upon the nomination of the Attorney-General. That seems to me unusual and a little out of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will say to the gentlemen from Minnesota that the law now in existence provides that these appointments shall be made upon the recommendation of the board of commissioners and the Attorney-General. It was simply for the purpose of simplifying these nominations that the recommendation is proposed to be placed in the hands of the Attorney-General, instead of the Attorney-General and the board of commissioners.

Mr. DUNNELL. I think my amendment is a very proper one. The amendment was not agreed to.
Mr. DUNNELL. Then I move to strike out the word "nomination" and insert in lieu thereof the word "recommendation," so that it will read, "who shall be appointed by the President upon the recommendation of the Attorney-General."

Mr. ANDERSON. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed

Mr. ANDERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARKET-HOUSE ON SQUARE 446, WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. NEAL. I am instructed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to report back, with amendments and to recommend its passage, the bill (H. R. No. 2157) to provide for building a market-house on square 446 in the city of Washington, District of Columbia. The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed, within thirty days after the passage of this act, to cause to be prepared plans and specifications for a market-house building, to be constructed of suitable materials to make a substantial, durable structure, on that part of square No. 446 purchased from W. W. Cororan, esq., for market purposes, in the city of Washington, in said District, fronting on Seventh street, extending from O street to P street, and of sufficient width to contain two hundred market-stalls not less than nine feet in length, with ample space for the use thereof for market purposes, together with proper sewerage, water-closets, water and gas pipes. The ground-plan shall show distinctly the location and size of each stall to be placed in said building, the width of passage-ways between said stalls; and each stall shall be numbered, and the number thereof shall be marked thereon on said ground-plan.

each stall shall be numbered, and the number thereor shall be marked thereon on said ground-plan.

SEC. 2. That, upon the completion of said plans and specifications, the commissioners shall fix the rent per annum that will be charged for each stall, which rent shall be payable in equal monthly installments in advance; but said rent shall not exceed an average of $5 per month per stall; and the commissioners shall cause the amount of rent so fixed for each stall to be placed thereon on said ground-plan.

SEC. 3. That, immediately after the completion of said ground-plan the manner aforesaid, the commissioners shall give notice by publication in a daily newspaper printed and published and of general circulation in the city of Washington, for six consecutive days, that said plan is subject to examination in the office of said commissioners, and that on a day to be named in said notice, not more than thirty days from the date of the first publication, they will proceed to sell at public auction, on said square, between the hours of one o'clock and four o'clock in the atternoon, the said stalls, as numbered on said plan, to the highest responsible bidder, subject to the rent fixed thereon, one-tenth of the purchase money to be paid in cash and the remainder in nine equal annual installments, bearing 8 per cent. per annum interest, payable semi-annually from and after the date of the completion of said building, as hereinafter provided for, and that said sale will be continued from day to day thereafter until all of said stalls are sold: Provided, That it shall not be obligatory upon said commissioners to continue such sales after a sufficient number have been sold to make the aggregate amount of purchase-money the sum of $100,000; but any remaining unsold may be afterward sold by said commissioners at such time and upon such notice as they may deem advisable.

Sec. 4. That, on the day fixed in said notice, and from day to day thereafter if necessary, said commissioners shall proceed to sell said stalls at public anction to the highest responsible bidder, on said square, according to said ground-plan, upon the terms mentioned in this act, and subject to the rents hereinbefore provided for, and the execution by the purchasers respectively of an obligation or obligations in such form as said commissioners shall prescribe, indersed or otherwise secured to the satisfaction of said commissioners for the payment of the residue in the installments, and bearing the interest in the preceding section specified, execute to the purchasers respectively a certificate of such purchases or obligations in such form as said commissioners for the payment of the payment of the rents aforesaid, lien shall nure to the benefit of the holder or holders of such obligation or obligations, and shall be enforced in favor of such holder or holders in the manner aforesaid.

Sec. 5. That, if sales of stalls shall be made amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $100,000, and the first payment shall be made, and the obligations shall be executed as hereinbefore provided for, then it shall be the duty of said commissioners to proceed forthwith in the erection of said market-building with the stalls aforesaid, according to the said plans and specifications; and, for this purpose, they are hereby authorized and directed to enter into such contract or contracts as they may deem advisable; but the entire cost of said building, including the stalls, shall not exceed the sum of $100,000; and said building and stalls shall be fully completed on or before the 1st day of October, A. D. 1876: Provided, That they shall not proceed with the erection of such building unless they can, by the negotiation of said obligations without recourse, together with the cash payments aforesaid, provide sufficient means to pay for the same.

Sec. 6. That, upon the completion of said building and stalls, the purchasers of said stalls respectively shall be, and they are hereby, authorized to take possession thereof, and to occupy and use the same for market purposes, upon the terms and conditions in this act set forth; and upon any failure, for the period of ten days after the same shall become due, to pay any installment of rent by any owner or lessee of any stall, or in default of the payment of any installment of purchasemoney, or of the interest thereon when the same shall become due, such stall and the right to the use thereof, may, at the option of the commissioners, be declared to be forfeited, which declaration of forfeiture shall be made a matter of record in the office of said commissioners, and a copy thereof shall be served upon the owner or upon the occupant of such stall; and thereupon, after five days' notice in a daily newspa

Mr. RANDALL. I move, as a substitute for the entire bill, the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to sell and dispose of, for school or other purposes, the square located in the city of Wash-ington and known as No. 446.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SAYLER.) The previous question not having been called, the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is in order.

Mr. RANDALL. In connection with that amendment I ask the Clerk to read a protest, which will speak for itself, against the passage of the original bill.

Mr. NEAL. Let the amendments of the committee be acted upon, in order to perfect the original bill.

Mr. RANDALL. We had better meet the matter right here.

Mr. NEAL. Very well. The Clerk read as follows:

Protest of the Market-Dealers' Mutual Protective Association against the favorable consideration by Congress of the bill authorizing the erection of what is known as the Coreoran market-house.

Protest of the Market-Dealers' Mutual Protective Association against the favorable consideration by Congress of the bill authorizing the erection of what is known as the Coreoran market-house.

The undersigned, executive committee of the Market-Dealers' Mutual Protective Association, in the name and on behalf of the organization which they have the honor to represent, beg leave respectfully to present to the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives this their protest against the favorable consideration by Congress of the bill authorizing the erection of what is known as the Corcoran market-house; and they beg leave further to embody herein certain statements of fact in connection therewith which will clearly establish, as they believe, the great injustice the bill in question must necessarily do them and the large interests they represent should it receive the sanction of your honorable bodies.

Your protestants desire to set forth that in 1872 they occupied what was called the Northern Liberty market-house, at the intersection of New York and Massachusetts avenues with K, Seventh, and Eighth streets; that by a wanton and reckless usurpation of authority on the part of the then board of public works, and at the instance (as is believed) of the Center Market Company, whose influence was paramount with said board, the Northern Liberty market-house was suddenly and without notice forn down and your protestants turned into the streets; that in this emergency they were compelled for the time being to re-establish their usiness in temporary sheds, and therein remained until through an organized effort they were enabled to secure an eligible lot and erect thereon, at great expense to themselves, the present imposing and magnificent market-house corner of K and Fifth streets.

That they were compelled for rely solely on their individual efforts to accomplish this, because of the repeated refusal of Governor Shepherd and the board of public works to entertain any proposition from them for sid in that behalf, sa any public interest; a fact which is abundantly shown in its being located but three squares from the building devoted to the same purposes on the corner of K and Fifth streets.

That its erection is urged solely in the interest of the O Street Railroad Company and the property holders in the immediate vicinity of the square selected as its site; and to advance the interests of this small coteric, your honorable bodies are asked wholly to disregard and sacrifice those of a large number of your fellow-citizens whom the action of a corrupt board of public works and the preservation of their business, not choice, compelled to place their means in the jeopardy threatened by the bill against which protest is here entered.

That the erection of the Corcoran market house is not urged by any considerable number of people who are to be benefited through its supplying a want now felt or likely to be pressing. And while there might be some claim presented on the ground of necessity for the erection of such building at some point on Fourteenth street or contiguous thereto, there can be none urged in support of one at the point named in the bill as the site of the Corcoran market-house.

Having been driven from their former places of business through the machinations and jealousy of a rival company, working through a venal and corrupt board of public works, and having been compelled through the same influence, working through the same channel, to erect out of their own means their present beautiful and complete market-house; and having at large additional expense taken long leases of the stalls therein; and having, under so many disadvantages, once more established themselves in successful business, your protestants respectfully urge that it would be in the highest degree unjust for your honorable bodies, through such legislation as is threatened, again to destroy their prosperity and turn to naught the constant, persistent, and honorable labor of years; especially so when no public want is to be met and no public good subs

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question is upon the amendments reported by the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. NEAL In the section of the country from which I come the democratic party has been generally recognized as the party of the democratic party has been generally recognized as the party of the people, organized in the interests of the people, and against monopolies of all kinds whatsoever. But to-day we have the strange spectacle of the great leader of that party upon the floor of this House stepping forward as the advocate of a monopoly and a corporation against the interests of the people of this city and of the District. I am amazed that such should be the action of the leader of the democratic party of this House.

Mr. RANDALL. You will not be so amazed when you hear my statement

Mr. NEAL. What are the facts? The bill now reported to this House with the unanimous recommendation of the Committee for the District of Columbia provides for the erection of a market-house upon square 446 in this city, in such a way, as I think I shall be able to show, as will not cost the Government of the United States or the government of the District of Columbia one dollar.

government of the District of Columbia one dollar.

If the House will give me their attention for a short time, I shall endeavor, in as plain and concise a manner as I can, to explain the provisions of this bill. By the first section the commissioners of this District are authorized and required, within thirty days after the passage of this bill, to cause to be prepared plans and specifications for a market-house building, to be constructed of suitable materials upon the square named, situated between Sixth and Seventh and O and P streets, in this city. The plan for the building is to contain two hundred stalls of specified dimensions, and the ground plan shall distinctly show the location and size of each stall, and the number of each shall be marked upon the ground plan. After this has been done, the commissioners are further required to fix a rent per annum that shall be charged for each stall, which shall not exceed an average of $5 per month, or $60 per year.

Then, as the next step, after this shall have been done, the commissioners are authorized and directed to advertise in some daily newspaper printed within this city, of general circulation, the fact that the plan is subject to examination in the office of said commissioners; and after thirty days' publication they are required to proceed to sell at public auction upon the square, between the hours of one and four o'clock in the afternoon, the stalls numbered on the plan to the highest responsible bidder, subject, however, to the rental which shall have been placed upon them by the commissioners as required by the preceding section. One-tenth of the purchase-money is to be paid cash in hand and the remaining nine-tenths in nine equal annual installments, which shall bear interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, to be secured in such manner as shall be satisfactory to the commissioners, they at the same time retaining a lien when the commissioners shall have sold in this manner stalls that will aggregate in amount $100,000, they are authorized to dispose of the notes and bonds which they may have taken for the deferred payments, without recourse upon the District government in any way whatever; and, after they shall in this way have secured and had paid into their hands the sum of $100,000, they are authorized to advertise for the letting of the contracts and the erection of the building, but not (mark you) until they have in their hands every dollar that shall be required to commence and complete the erection of the market-house.

Right here I will state that under a previous law the Legislative Assembly of this District contracted for the erection of a markethouse upon this identical square; work was commenced; and to-day, by reason of a failure of the commissioners of the District to comply with the terms of their contract, the contractor holds a just and valid claim against the District authorities for the sum of $6,000 or $8,000 for work actually done. This bill provides that the commissioners shall rid themselves of this claim against the District authorities by settling with this contractor for the work actually done and which will be utilized in the erection of this building. The contractor is to be paid the amount allowed him upon such settlement out of the first proceeds realized from the sale of these stalls. So that it will be seen that under the terms of this bill, carefully guarded in every particular, not one dollar of public money can be expended in the erection of this building. On the contrary, an examination of the facts will prove to the satisfaction of any one that money will be actually saved to the people of this District. The property upon which the market-house is proposed to be erected was property upon which the market-house is proposed to be erected was purchased for the purpose for which we now propose it shall be used so far back as 1872, for the amount of $100,000, payable twenty years after date, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum; and from that time to this the authorities of the District have been required to pay this $7,000 per annum as interest upon that obligation which is still outstanding and unsatisfied, while by the terms of this bill, if it shall become law and its provisions be fully and completely executed, $12,000 will be realized every year as rent from the several stalls, two hundred in number, in the market-house, thus enabling the authorities of the District to meet, as it shall fall due from time to time, the $7,000 interest, and in addition to this to accumulate gradually a sinking fund in their treasury for the final payment of the principal when it shall become due. The sum of $5,000 will be collected by them every year, and put into their treasury as a sinking fund to meet the principal of this indebtedness at its maturity, as was contemplated by the acts of the Legislative Assembly under which the market-house was first proposed to be erected.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that those who constitute this monopoly, this corporation, which stands here alone to-day in opposition to the passage of this bill, have no rights upon which we need have any fear that we shall trespass. They have no merits whatever in the claim which they assert here in that protest. So far from this, whatever they have done in the premises has been done with full knowledge of all the facts which I have stated, and others to which I shall now direct your attention.

So far back as August 23, 1871, the first Legislature Assembly of this District passed a bill authorizing and requiring the committees on markets of the two houses of the Assembly to select, subject to the approval of the governor, sites for market-houses in the northern and western sections of the city, and the governor was authorized and directed to purchase the same upon the most reasonable terms. I repeat (for I desire to impress it upon your minds) that herein this act, so far back as 1871, we find a provision authorizing the purchase of the site for this northern market.

Subsequently to this, on the 19th of June, 1872, the governor of the District was authorized and instructed to purchase this identical property, square 446, of Mr. W. W. Corcoran on the liberal and munificent terms proposed by him, as the act itself states. So that more than three years ago this square was purchased for the purpose of erecting thereon this market-house. Appropriations were made, bonds of the District government were authorized to be issued, the contract for the building of a portion of this market-house was actually entered into, and the work commenced. It failed only because of the failure of the governor of the District to negotiate the bonds of the District in accordance with the terms of the act. But from that day to this there have been from one hundred and fifty to two hundred butchers and market-dealers occupying temporary sheds upon this identical ground; men who were driven out of the old Northern Liberty Market, which had been torn down by the action of the board of public works; who were promised in lieu of that market the erection of this structure upon the site named in this bill, and who by the terms of the acts of the Legislative Assembly which had appropri-ated $2,000 for the purpose of constructing these temporary sheds were authorized to enter and occupy them, free of charge, until the expiration of the leases which they held from the District government for the occupation of stalls in the Northern Liberty market. From that day to this these parties, from one hundred and fifty to two hundred of them, have been carrying on a market upon this identical square in temporary structures, which are insufficient at times to protect them from the weather.

Now, after all this had been done, after these acts had been passed after this property had been purchased and a contract for the erection of this market-house entered into and partly consummated, this monoply, this corporation which is here to-day protesting against the passage of this bill, as late as February 23, 1874, organized under the general law for the organization of incorporated companies in this District, and commenced the erection of their market-house which they complain we are now about to interfere with to the detriment of their rights and

So you will see these gentlemen have no equities in this case. The position they occupy to-day is one of their own voluntary selection, one into which they entered with the full knowledge of the fact that the District authorities had passed a law providing for the purchase of this property and for the erection of this market-house, and if they suffer in the slightest degree by the erection of this structure as now proposed, the fault will rest with themselves. Whatever injury or damage they may sustain will accrue to them through their own negligence in the premises.

And the simple question for us now to determine is whether we, in order to foster and build up this monopoly, shall say to these gentlemen who have incorporated this company that they shall have the exclusive right and privilege of furnishing all the citizens of the northern portion of this city with their provisions, with their meats and vegetables, or whether we shall permit other citizens who are engaged in like business to compete with them.

I maintain still further, Mr. Speaker, that to erect this market-house market-mouse is nothing more or less than the part of good faith to the butchers and market-men who are in possession of the temporary sheds on this square 446; that it is no less than good faith to the citizens of that section of this city. I maintain furthermore that good faith to Mr. Corcoran, who sold these premises to the District government for the purpose of erecting a market-house thereon, requires this thing should be done. It is evident from the very language of the act under which the purchase was made that Mr. Corcoran had disposed of the property to the District for that purpose at something less than its true value. The act itself declares that the Government was authorized to purchase it on the munificent and liberal terms proposed by Mr. Corcoran And to-day Mr. Corcoran, in a letter which I hold in my hand dated December 30, 1875, states, first, that square 446 was sold by him to the District of Columbia for a market-place; and, second, that he desired and expected that square would be devoted to the purpose for which it was sold. It was expected at the time it was to be used for the erection of a market-house. So, while there may be no legal obligation on the part of the District so far as the rights of Mr. Corcoran are concerned, I maintain we will be guilty of bad faith to him if we now, as proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Randall,] pass a bill or joint resolution providing for the sale of this property and its use for any other purpose than that originally pro-

Now, sir, if the gentlemen who are opposed to the passage of this Now, sir, if the gentlemen who are opposed to the passage of this bill can show that by any possibility one dollar can be taken from the Treasury of the United States or from the District government, to be used in the erection of this market-house, then we as members of the committee are perfectly willing an amendment shall be made to prevent any such thing, although we believe that no such liability can now by any possibility be incurred either by the Government or by the District by the District.

As appears from the argument of those interested in this monopoly, which has been laid upon the table of every member this afternoon, this identical property, this square 446, with all the disadvantages under which it has labored, with only these temporary sheds erected thereon, paid during the last year into the Treasury of this District government more than one-half of all the revenues derived from the market-houses of this city. Three thousand seven hundred and fifty-four dollars out of $6,195 were paid by the occupants of the temporary sheds on this property—more than the four other market-houses com-bined. If there be anything wanting to show the necessity for the erection of this market-house, I think we find it in the very fact that one hundred and fifty or two hundred market-men and butchers in this city have been content under all these disadvantages to occupy these temporary sheds, and have been able to thrive and prosper in business there so as to pay into the District government treasury more revenue than all the other market-houses of the District combined.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the petition which I presented came from parties in interest in another market-house, but the amendment which I offered, it seems to me, is right irrespective of any interest of these petitioners. This in fact to my wind is the promotion of of those petitioners. This, in fact, to my mind, is the promotion of a private enterprise at the public expense. I have no earthly objection, if persons can be found who will contribute and subscribe money, if they think it a profitable investment to build all the market-houses they think it a profitable investment to build all the market-houses which they may deem to be necessary in this city; but I do distinctly object to giving away the District property to individuals for the purpose of erecting market-houses when I consider additional market facilities are not required. Indeed, sir, our experience in connection with the giving away of public land for the purpose of erecting a market-house is very much against the repetition of any such action on the part of Congress. All will remember the controversies which sprang out of the grant of land at the corner of Seventh and Pennsylvania avenue to private individuals upon which to erect a market-house. It immediately produced a collision between the market company and the owners of the stalls by reason of extravagant rates of pany and the owners of the stalls by reason of extravagant rates of rental, which, in fact, came out of the pockets of those who purchased rental, which, in fact, came out of the pockets of those who purchased the beef and the products in that market. So the other market, by the act of the board of public works, having been torn down and these market people having been sent off, they were forced into this market, but subsequently went up and bought a lot there with their own money and as a private enterprise erected a market building.

Now, if my amendment shall be adopted and the property shall be sold, I have no earthly objection that these gentlemen, if they so desire, shall go there and purchase this lot, and put their market-house on it at their own expense. But I am unwilling to give the public property of this District to any private person for any purpose whatever; and least of all when it comes in competition with the citizens who in good faith have erected at their own expense another market-house within three squares off.

And just let me say here that in passing this lot from Mr. Corcoran to the District there was no condition whatever in that sale. In regard to the necessity for this market, I want to show what is the fact, as I am informed, that stalls in the new market, the Northern Liberty market, have not been rented, and are not now entirely rented, proving that there is actually no necessity for another market up there.

If you will examine this bill, which I have only read to-day for the first time, you will find that the certificate of the purchase of a stall-

Shall be deemed to vest in such purchaser the right to the use of the stall so purased in perpetuity.

And if you will read further on you will find it provided by the seventh section of this bill-

That said stalls shall not be liable to any tax other than the rent hereinbefore provided for.

Mr. NEAL. The committee have reported an amendment to strike out that section.

Mr. RANDALL. I am glad that they have come to their senses in

Mr. NEAL. I believe they are as much in their senses as the gentleman ever was in his.

Mr. RANDALL. If my substitute be adopted, as I have said, and these people come in and buy that lot as any other people might do, I have no objection to their doing so; and I have no objection to there being as many markets as private enterprise and private money will build. But I am utterly unwilling to take the public lands of the District for such a purpose when I believe that a market there is unnecessary. I ask the previous question on the amendment.

Mr. HENDEE rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BLACKBURN.) The Chair understands that if the previous question be ordered on the amendment it will not be exhausted with the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. In calling the previous question on the substitute I do not want to interfere with the consideration of the bill if the substitute should be voted down. I want that the bill shall be treated with all fairness. I only ask the previous question on my substitute, and I call for the reading of the substitute again.

The substitute was again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HENDEE?]

Mr. HENDEE. It strikes me that the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield.

nia would be acting quite unfairly if he insisted on the previous question now

Mr. RANDALL. I only want the previous question on my substi-tute. But if the gentleman wishes to speak now and will agree to renew the call for the previous question after he has spoken, I will withdraw it for the present.

Mr. HENDEE. I suppose it would be quite fair—

Mr. RANDALL. That is what I intend to be.

Mr. HENDEE. I suppose it would be quite fair, as the gentleman who offers the amendment has made the only remarks upon it, that I should now be heard. As a matter of course when I shall have spoken I will put the gentleman in the same position he occupies now.

Mr. RANDALL. The acting chairman of the committee who re-

Mr. RANDALL. The acting charman of the committee who reported the bill discussed it for a great length of time.

Mr. HENDEE. As a member of the committee I think I am entitled to make a few remarks. I did not intend to say anything upon this bill when it was reported by the acting chairman of the committee. But, inasmuch as it has created a little discussion and as I have some knowledge of the facts, perhaps it is proper that I should make a statement to the House and give briefly my views upon the proprieties of the passage of the bill. Several years ago, I think some four or five years ago, the city government purchased of Mr. Corcoran square No. 446, situated between O and P streets, in the northwest part of the city. It was understood at the time, and the agreement was made in perfect good faith between the purchasers and Mr. Corcoran the grantor, that the purchase was made for the purpose, and the sole purpose, of constructing a market upon the square. Now what has been the result? A great many people in the District of Columbia, poor people as well, perhaps, as people of means, in view of the fact that it had been agreed that a market should be built on that square, have purchased in different sections about that market-place property. They have built it up at great expense; they have made this a valuable part of the city; and they have done it almost solely upon the ground that Mr. Corcoran had virtually donated that ground for market purposes.

But now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] says it would be unjust to the people who now occupy the Northern Liberty Market to allow another one to be built within the limits he has named, only three or four squares off. But I think the injustice is not to the parties who are occupying the Northern Liberty Market, not to the parties who are occupying the Northern Liberty Market, but directly to the parties who have purchased the property about square 446, improved that property, and made it valuable to themselves on the ground that they were to have a market in their immediate vicinity. There is where I think the injustice applies if you refuse to pass this bill. The gentleman desires to sell the lot. Now, this bill virtually is a sale of the lot, and it is a sale of the lot to the parties who shall build stalls or purchase stalls upon the ground, as provided in this bill. The bill provides that neither the District government part the United States Government either shall nay one dollar ernment nor the United States Government either shall pay one dollar toward the construction of this market building. We are already as a Government, standing behind the District of Columbia, indebted to certain parties for making improvements on this square for market purposes; the foundation-walls have already been constructed at an expense of about $8,000; that $8,000 has never been paid. To-day the party who did that work has a claim, and it is a good claim, against the Government. This bill provides that whoever builds the market shall pay that $8,000, and relieve the District from the payment of it. Further, the bill provides that a certain rental shall be paid, and that rental will amount to $12,000, or thereabouts, annually. Now, annually we are paying to Mr. Corcoran the sum of $7,000 interest on the purchase-money for this square. This bill provides that that interest shall be paid out of the rentals. There is $7,000 annually saved to the Government of the United States, and it seems to me that is an item worth considering, and I believe further that under the provisions of this bill we should realize also a revenue of $5,000 a year, which in twenty years would pay the principal which we owe Mr. Corcoran for the site. This, sir, is a simple sale of that property, for just what it cost the Government, or the District govproperty, for just what it cost the Government, or the District government, as I look at it, to the parties who propose to build the market; and while we sell the land, as proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, though not for the purposes proposed in his substitute, we relieve ourselves of a debt now existing of $7,000 annually, and also of $8,000 which we owe for constructing the market, so far as it has been constructed.

Now, during the last Congress over three thousand persons, if I remember the number right, petitioned that Congress to allow to be built on that square a market for their accommodation, just in accord-ance with the original agreement. Now I think that we should stand here in defense of the rights of those three thousand petitioners rather than the rights of that private institution known as the Northern Liberty market, which bought its property with its own money and stands on its own rights and is legitimately competing for the trade in this Again, Mr. Speaker, what is to prevent the present owners of the Northern Liberty market from selling out to-day? Nothing in the world. If they can make money by it and make a good investment or profit by selling it for any other purpose, they have a right so to do. There is no law of Congress, neither can we pass one, which will prevent them from doing this, and then of course the whole northern part of the city would be without market accommodations.

This market is to be built under the regulations prescribed in this bill and must always be kept and used as a market, and a market for the benefit of the people living in that section of this city. Now, sir, let me say a little more. All the persons who stand upon that square to-day, and there are about one hundred and twenty-five of them, together with the market-men who are in what is now known as the Northern Liberty market on K street, were formerly doing business in what was known as the Northern Liberty market on Seventh street and Massachusetts avenue, which was destroyed under the orders of Governor Shepherd. After its destruction they moved on to this square 446, known as Corcoran square. It is not a large square, and the gentlemen who were on that square and had money spent it in purchasing the Savage property and built the new Northern Liberty market; those who had no money were compelled to stay under the old sheds, and they are there to-day, doing a large amount of business and accommodating thousands of people in this city. There are now from one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and fifty men who are occupying that square, and they only ask of the United States that they may from their own pockets, not from yours, not from mine, not from the Treasury of the United States or the District treasury, but from their own pockets, build a shelter which will properly protect them, and put them in a position to sell the people of this city good healthy meat and the vegetable products of the country. This is all they ask; simply the privilege with their own money to build themselves a market; and it seems to me that it would be great injustice on the part of the House to deny these people that

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say further that this matter was before the Committee for the District of Columbia in the last Congress, and was considered favorably. It has been before the committee this session, and arguments have been heard day in and day out for at least six weeks in regard to this market, and the committee are unanimous, as I understand it, in favor of the passage of this bil'. We found only one voice from this entire District opposed to the construction of this market, and that is the voice of men who are afraid of competition. Now, I say that competition is the life of business. I say that anything which prevents competition is contrary, to say the least, to your boasted democratic doctrine. I say give every person in the District who has the money the power to improve it with fine structures if they will, and we ought not to deny these gentlemen this opportunity.

I now yield the floor for a moment to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Vermont agreed to call the previous question at the close of his remarks, but I have no objection to his yielding to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I know this bill and its effect only from the reading of it and of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] I know nothing of the parties interested in it, either personally or otherwise. But I think if the House will look for a moment at the two propositions now presented to them, it cannot hesitate to reject the substitute offered by the gen-

What is the purpose of the bill reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia? It is to divide this lot of ground, known as square No. 446, into two hundred lots, to be shown by a groundplan. These two hundred lots are to be put up for sale, subject to a ground-rent, which ground-rent is to be previously fixed by the board of commissioners. Each purchaser of a lot buys it in fee-simple, subject only to the ground-rent so fixed for the use of the property, and having bought it in fee-simple, of course it is in perpetuity. Here will be two hundred small lots, open to purchase by any poor man who desires to engage in the business of marketing. Any poor man in the city or in the country can come in and purchase one of these small lots. But if you put it up for sale in gross, as proposed by the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, this property which cost the city of Washington $100,000, who can compete for its purchase? No one of Washington $100,000, who can compete for its purchase? No one but moneyed men and capitalists. Then where lies the interest of the District of Columbia, to whom this land belongs—not to the United States Government, as would seem to be the impression conveyed by the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who says he is opposed to taking public property for private use. This is not taking public property for private use, but it is exposing to sale public property belonging to the District government, whose guardians we are.

Mr. RANDALL. How do you propose to sell this land?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The bill provides—

Mr. RANDALL. You propose to give it away.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That shows that my friend has not read the bill even once.

Mr. RANDALL. I have read it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Then you did not understand it; I will ive you the benefit of that excuse. This bill provides that this land give you the benefit of that excuse. This bill provides that this land shall be divided into two hundred lots, to be shown upon a ground-plan to be drawn by an architect and shown to the public by the commissioners. Before they are to be exposed for sale they are to be numbered and made subject to a ground-rent not to exceed $5 per month, so that any purchaser, when he goes to buy, will know how much ground-rent he will have to pay. It is to be offered at public sale, lot by lot, until all the lots are disposed of. The two hundred lots are to be sold in fee-simple, subject to a ground-rent to be fixed in advance by the commissioners, so that no man shall be taken by surprise and each man will know when he buys what he is buying. That is a fair sale, at public auction, with due competition, open to poor men, men of moderate means. But the gentleman proposes to stall it in a lunw "for school or other puresses." sell it in a lump "for school or other purposes."

Mr. SAVAGE. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment to ask a question for information ?

Mr. SAVAGE. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment to ask a question for information?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. SAVAGE. Is the money for which these two hundred lots are to be sold to be paid into the District treasury or to be used for the erection of a market building?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The first $100,000 is to be used for the erection of a building, and if there is a surplus after that, it will belong to the District of Columbia.

Mr. SAVAGE. Does the bill so provide?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. And to be used to pay off the debt now resting on the property, and on which an annual interest of $7,000 has to be paid by the District government. Now, which proposition presents the better chance to get a good price for this land? To sell it in gross, and open only to purchase by capitalists, or in small parcels, two hundred or more lots, by which means poor men can come in and compete for the lots, and the people of the District will be made good what they have paid for this land and fulfill the promise of Mr. Corcoran, who said when he sold this land that it was for a market-house? market-house?

I regard not those who have bought lots in expectation, or who have put up a market-house on their own hook, for they knew this land had been bought for a market-house, and that a market-house was to be built on it, unless by the connivance of those in charge, who had no right to make such a pledge, they were assured there would be no market-house built there.

I think the substitute should be voted down for its ambiguity, if for nothing else. It says that this lot, No. 446, shall be exposed to public sale and in the lump "for school or other purposes." If it is to be for school purposes, then say so; if not, then strike out "for school or other purposes," and say for public sale and to the highest bidder, which of course will include only Mr. Corcoran and others of similar wealth.

According to promise, I now call the previous question on the substitute for the bill.

Mr. NEAL. I call the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered. The amendments reported from the committee were agreed to.

The substitute moved by Mr. RANDALL was not agreed to, upon a division; ayes 17, noes not counted.

The question was upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the bill be laid upon the table. The motion was not agreed to. The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 22, noes 96.
So (one-fifth not voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. NEAL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker— Mr. DURHAM. I move that the House now adjourn. Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Dur-HAM] will withdraw his motion for a moment.

The queston being taken on the motion, there were—ayes 72, noes 47. Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. Holman and Mr. Durham were appointed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Kentucky will withdraw his motion.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. DURHAM. I have no objection to withdrawing the motion to allow the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Terry] to make a report; but I will not withdraw it for any other purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SAYLER.) Debate is not in order. The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 44. Mr. COCHRANE. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 21, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Byron Sunderland, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present the petition of the Right Worthy Grand Lodge of Good Templars of the United States, said to represent 850,000 members, the petition being signed by the officers thereof, praying for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories; also, for the prohibition of the importation of alcoholic liquors from abroad; also, that total abstinence be made a condition of the civil, military, and naval service; and for a constitu-tional amendment prohibiting the traffic in alcoholic beverages throughout the national domain. I believe this question has passed from the Senate and the bill has gone to the House. Under that impression I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I offer a similar petition of the Good Templars of the State of Minnesota, and, for the reason just stated by the Senator

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the vacation by the Government of that portion of the military reservation at Fort Abercrombie, Dakota Territory, which lies on the east side of Red River in the State of Minnesota, and to open the same to settlement and occupation under the homestead and pre-emption laws; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of Margaret Mills, widow of the late Surgeon Madison Mills, brevet brigadier-general United States Army, praying that her pension may be increased from twenty-five to fifty dollars a month; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, remonstrating against the passage of a law authorizing the bridging of the Detroit River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war, praying for the passage of an act granting to them and their heirs—except commissioned officers—a bounty of eight and onethird dollars per month for the time served, deducting all United States bounty heretofore paid; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Washington County, Illinois, praying for the repeal of the two-cent stamp tax on bank-checks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of C. M. Levy, captain in the volunteer service in 1863, praying that he may be allowed the amount of two years' pay and allowances as captain and assistant quartermaster of volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of the Grand Division Sons of Tem-perance of Illinois, officially signed and representing 2,000 members, praying for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories, the prohibition of the importation of alcoholic liquors; that total abstinence be made a condition of the civil, military, and naval service; and for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the traffic in alcoholic beverages throughout the national domain; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I have a similar petition to that just presented by the Senator from Illinois in reference to the liquor traffic, signed officially by the officers of the Temperance Alliance of the State of Massachusetts, and I ask that it take the same course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will lie on the table.

Mr. DAWES presented a memorial of merchants and business men in the city of Boston, remonstrating against the repeal of the bank rupt law, and that there may be essential amendments made thereto; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SARGENT. I present a petition relating to the liquor traffic, similar to that presented by other Senators, from the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of California, officially signed, representing 211 lodges and an actual membership of 10,132. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER. I present a similar petition from the Grand Divis-ion of the Sons of Temperance of East Tennessee, and I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a similar petition of the Sons of Temperance of Ohio, signed by the officers, representing 8,000 members. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I present one of a similar character from the Grand Lodge of Good Templars, signed by the officers, represent-ing 14,000 members. I move that it lie on the table. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DORSEY. I present a similar petition, signed by the officers of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of Arkansas, representing 1,000 members. I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN presented the petition of S. W. Furber and others, praying that the present rate of duty on linseed and linseed-oil be retained; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the passage of an act for the extension of time to settlers under the timber-culture act of Congress whose trees have been destroyed by grasshoppers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the extension of the Hastings and Dakota Railway; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I present the petition of D. Nettleton, A. Richards, and 257 other citizens of the State of Michigan, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia and Territories of the United States. I am in doubt to what committee it ought to go. I do not understand that the action of the Senate, which has already been had, really touches this point. That was a matter of inquiry merely; and this calls for legislation. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I present the petition of the Methodist Episcopal church of Natick, Massachusetts, signed by its officers, and the petition of the Bay View Methodist church of Gloucester, Massachusetts, signed by its officers, in regard to the liquor traffic. I move that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I present a petition from the Grand Division Sons of Temperance of Virginia, signed by W. F. Brown, grand worthy patriarch of Virginia, and E. D. Bland, grand worthy scribe, in regard to the liquor traffic; and I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall all the other petitions offered this morning in relation to this subject take the same reference? They were laid on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, to this question. The proposition is to refer all the petitions on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic to the Committee on the Judiciary. It occurred to me that that was hardly a proper reference. I call his attention to it, however, and if he has no objection, of course I shall not insist upon a contrary course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood the Chair to say that they were to

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood the Chair to say that they were to be laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Three or four were laid on the table, and then a petition was offered by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Christiannex,] and inasmuch as it involved a constitutional amendment or legislation relating to the District of Columbia, it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It was so referred on that Senator's motion. The others that followed were also referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Chair suggested that they had better all take the same course, and he asked the expression of the Senate on that point.

ate on that point.

Mr. ALLISON. Ought they not to go to the Committee on Finance, because they relate to the importation of liquors?

Mr. LOGAN. But the petitions call for a constitutional amend-

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; these petitions—I hold one in my hand—do not ask for any constitutional amendment, so far as I can see. They ask to have the sale and manufacture of these beverages in the District of Columbia and in the Territories of the United States prohibited. They ask also for the prohibition of their importation from foreign countries. Further, they ask for legislation that shall require "total abstinence from all alcoholic beverages on the part of all officials and subordinates in the civil, military, and naval service;" and, fourth, "to initiate and adopt, for ratification by the several States of the Union, a constitutional amendment, which shall make the traffic in alcoholic beverages illegal throughout our national domain." in alcoholic beverages illegal throughout our national domain." Three of these objects plainly are not those for judicial consideration, so to speak. They are objects which relate to the general welfare of the people in this District and in the Territories. They concern the subject of importation; they relate not only to the general welfare, but also to the question of revenue; and when it comes to total abstinence on the part of all officers and subordinates in the civil, military, and naval services—which, as the Senate decided in the case of Blount, does not apply to members of the House of Representatives or Senators, so that nobody here can be disturbed on that account that is a subject that ought to go to the Committee on the Civil Service plainly.

I submit, then, that either this matter must be divided or it ought to go primarily to the Committee on the District of Columbia, as the first thing asked for, which is really the only practicable one probably, is the prohibition of this traffic in the District of Columbia and in the Territories. I ask, therefore, that the reference to the Committee on the Judiciary be changed to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Here we undoubtedly have constitutional power to do what the public welfare demands, and that committee is charged with considering whether the public welfare does demand it.

I present the petition from the Grand Lodge of Vermont of the Independent Order of Good Templars, representing 5,400 persons, asking for this species of legislation, and I move that it and the other petitions go to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which is the irst really practical point in the petition.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The reference of the petition which I presented would be as appropriate to the Committee on Territories as to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us begin at home, right here in the capital.
Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I suppose one is equally competent to act upon the subject with the other. The petition which I presented does not ask any constitutional amendment or the prohibition of foreign importation, but simply prays for the prohibition of the manufacture

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves the reference of all these petitions to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I have a petition like that presented by the Senator from Vermont, signed by the Good Templars of the State of New York through their proper officers, and I move that it take the reference given to the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONKLING. I have also twenty-one hundred and eightyseven different petitions, accompanied by, I am instructed, one hundred letters, which I have not counted myself, in respect of the proosed change of the Pension Bureau to the War Department. petitions come from pensioners, both men and women, chiefly from the State of New York, but in some degree from other States. They assign, as well in the petitions as more especially in the letters, their reason for remonstrating earnestly against this change, and they make statements expressive of the truth, as they believe it to be, that the present pension service is economical, convenient, and certainly as free from danger of fraud as it could well be; and is in that respect, as in others, superior to the arrangement as it will be should the service be transplanted to the War Department. I suppose the Committee on Pensions is the appropriate committee to which to move a reference of these petitions

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions will take that refer-

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the petition of Maria H. Granger, widow of the late Major-General Gordon Granger, praying to be allowed a pension. In presenting this petition, I venture to say to the Committee on Pensions that it has the attention and solicitude of many persons whose judgment and wish are entitled at least to consideration in the committee. I move its reference to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KEY presented the petition of the Good Templars of Tennessee, officially signed, praying for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories in relation to the liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GORDON. I present petitions for the improvement of the har-bor of Brunswick, from the city council of Brunswick, the mayor and council, also from the city council of Macon, Georgia, and also from the Board of Trade and of Pilotage of the city of Brunswick. I wish simply to remark that the city of Brunswick has probably the very best harbor south of New York, unless it be a harbor on the South Carolina coast. I hope that these petitions will receive the favorable attention of the Committee on Commerce, to which committee I move their reference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORDON presented a petition of citizens of Georgia, praying for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Commrthe repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McMILLAN. I present a petition which has been forwarded to me, signed by John Brown Smith, of Amherst, Massachusetts, praying for an amendment of the naturalization laws of the United States "so that they shall fully recognize the natural right of the citizens to withdraw allegiance from government at will and retain all such rights in their own self-sovereign individualities." In accordance with the request of the petitioner, I present the petition and move its with the request of the petitioner, I present the petition and move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have received and been requested to present a memorial from citizens of this District, signing themselves "Good Templars," asking for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories in relation to the sale of spirituous liquors and for an amendment of the Constitution so that the traffic may be prohibited all over the country. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Other petitions of like nature have been referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let it go there.

The petition was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia

Mr. HITCHCOCK presented a petition from the Sons of Temperance of Nebraska, praying for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories in relation to the sale of spirituous liquors; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations direct me to report back the action of the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and recommend that the Senate insist on its amendments to this bill and ask for a conference with the House of Repre-

and Mr. WALLACE.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WHYTE (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 621) for the relief of Jesse H. Weirick; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee

Mr. INGALLS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 624) to incorporate the Citizens' Mutual Gas-Light Company of the City of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 625) approving the building of the Union Railroad of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. KEY, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers in the case of Moses Brooks be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of Eleazer Williams be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

EULOGIES OF SENATOR O. S. FERRY.

Mr. ENGLISH submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That 12,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in the two Houses of Congress upon the late Orris S. Ferry, late United States Senator from Connecticut, be printed, 4,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 8,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives; and that the Secretary of the Treasury have printed the portrait of Mr. Ferry to accompany the same.

HEIRS OF GENERAL JAMES H. CARLETON.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 63.

The motion was agreed to: and the bill (S. No. 63) granting relief to Eva, Etta, Henry, and Guy Carleton, heirs of General James H. Carleton, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WRIGHT. The bill was once before the Senate and was passed over because of a suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont, EDMUNDS.] Since that time I have corresponded with the War Office and got information which I have submitted to him. There are one or two formal amendments. I ask that the amendments may be reported and acted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on Claims will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendments are in lines 5 and 6 to strike The CHIEF CLERK. The amendments are in lines 5 and 6 to strike out "Eva, Etta, Henry, and Guy Carleton, heirs," and insert "Eva Vansant, Henry Carleton, and Maud Carleton, children;" in line 8, after the words "legal representatives," to insert "in full satisfaction;" and in line 12 to strike out "with interest from the date of the award of the board of survey" and insert "being the amount found due by a board organized;" so that the bill, as amended, will read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Eva Vansant, Henry Carleton, and Maud Carleton, children of General James H. Carleton, or their legal representatives, in full satisfaction for property destroyed by order of General Canby, dated Fort Oraig, New Mexico, February 21, 1862, the sum of $7,600, being the amount found due by a board organized under Special Orders No. 159, issued by General E. R. S. Canby, and dated Santa Fé, New Mexico, September 3, 1862.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. DAVIS. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Claims whether this bill passed the Senate at the last Congress?
Mr. WRIGHT. It passed the Senate at the last Congress and also the Congress before. It is the same bill precisely as reported by the Senator from Virginia himself at the last Congress.
Mr. DAVIS. The same amount?
Mr. WRIGHT. The same amount exactly, and precisely the same bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I think it right; for I reported on that bill once, and it struck my ear when I heard it read.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engressed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read, "A bill granting relief to Eva Vansant, Henry Carleton, and Maud Carleton, children of General James H. Carleton."

SIOUX RESERVATION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the considera-tion of the bill which was under consideration yesterday morning, being Senate bill No. 590.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 590) provid-ing for an agreement with the Sioux Nation in regard to a portion of their reservation, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which is to strike out in line 4 of section [6] 5 "10" and insert "20;" so as to make the amount "$20,000."

Mr. DAVIS. Do I understand that as advancing the amount from $10,000 to $20,000 for the expenses of the commission?

Mr. ALLISON. That is the object.

Mr. DAVIS. Is there necessity for it?

Mr. ALLISON. The committee thought, inasmuch as the number of commissioners was increased from three to five, it might require more than $10,000, and they were not certain as to the length of time that it might be necessary to occupy, and therefore they proposed to insert $20,000 in lieu of $10,000. Of course if that sum is not neces-

Mr. DAVIS. I understood yesterday that there was an amendment offered or to be offered to the bill looking to the employment of Army officers, and in that case it certainly would not require anything like the amount of $20,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course it would not be used if the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Merrimon] should prevail. In that event this sum would not be required; but that has not yet been voted upon. If it should be adopted, only so much of the sum as should be required would be used.

Mr. DAVIS. My experience is that when money is appropriated for a purpose, it generally gets out of the Treasury in some manner or other. If it is not used directly, it is indirectly. My fear is that this will all be used. I doubt the propriety very much, especially if the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina should prevail of appropriating even the half of $10,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senator from West Virginia need have no apprehension on that score. This appropriation is to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and of course none of it will be used unless it shall be absolutely required. I think there is no dauger.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Paddock, Patterson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, West, Windom, and Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, English, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Ransom, Robertson, Whyte, and Withers—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Dawes, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Harvey, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Randolph, Saulsbury, Sharon, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Wallace—23.

So the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was to add to section [6] 5 the following:

And the further sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated to make suitable provision to aid the said commission in the discharge of the duties required by this act, and said sums shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. DAVIS. I think some explanation ought to be given why $50,000 additional is appropriated by this amendment. We should know what it is for, what it means. We should not vote $50,000 unless some explanation is given. I hope those who have charge of the bill and know what it is will tell us.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was discussed yesterday. A full explanation was given yesterday.

Mr. ALLISON. In reply to the query of the Senator from West Virginia I will state that the committee believed that this sum might be necessary in order to effectuate what the bill proposes. It has been usual to appropriate these incidental sums as preliminary to making treaties with Indians. In 1867 Congress appropriated $150,000 for a similar purpose, to effectuate the treaty of 1868. It is a question purely within the discretion of Congress whether or not this sum shall be appropriated for this purpose. The committee believed that it was essential in order to insure success, and therefore have reported this amendment. That is about all I can say with reference to it.

Mr. BOGY. I think that the Senate has not a correct understanding of this question, and indeed of this entire bill. The amendment which was voted on a while ago was to increase the appropriation for which was voted on a while ago was to increase the appropriation for expenses from $10,000 to $20,000. That amendment was voted down. Now it is proposed to make an appropriation of $50,000 for the purpose of enabling the commission to effect the object which is embraced in the bill. We have to approach this subject as a whole. These Indians are occupying a reservation, a portion of which we are anxious to obtain; it may be but a small portion of their reservation, but nevertheless it is a portion that they do not like to give up. It was stated yesterday by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that this portion called the Black Hills country was not occupied by the Indians; that they were in point of fact yet in the State of Nebraska south of the line provided by the treaty of 1868. That is true. These two big tribes, or rather two bands composing one tribe, at the head of one of which is the noted chief called Red Cloud, and at the head of the other is the other noted chief called Spotted Tail, occupy with their agencies now a country which is outside of their reservation, south of the line of their reservation; but it is within the country Now it is proposed to make an appropriation of $50,000 for the purpose south of the line of their reservation; but it is within the country which belongs to those Indians by treaty stipulation made with them some years ago, and which, indeed, has belonged to them from time immemorial, and they contend is their country yet; because we must all understand that these poor fellows do not very well comprehend all understand that these poor fellows do not very well comprehend this thing of a line unless it is very well marked by a stream or a mountain or a deep valley. The Indians believe now that both the Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies are upon their lands, and they occupy with their agency establishments and their towns and villages a country south of the Black Hills; but they nevertheless claim the Black Hills as their country. They are from that country; they were all, I may say, born in the Black Hills country, and they now roam over the Black Hills country as their own domain. It is to a certain extent their hunting-ground, although the game is rather scarce in that whole region of country. They do not like to give it up. in that whole region of country. They do not like to give it up. Why? But a short time ago, in 1868, we made a treaty with them by which they were told that they could keep that country for many, many years, indeed forever; and now we are calling upon them to cede perhaps the country that they like the best, the region between the two rivers, the North Fork of the Cheyenne and the South Fork of the Cheyenne. Now, is it to be supposed that these Indians, believing that it is their country, as in point of fact it is their country, will give it we wishout advants comparation with at their country, will give it up without adequate compensation, without proper means being used to obtain it from them?

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] yesterday said that the whites had no business there, and that they should be sent away by the strong arm of the Government. That is true. The persons who have been induced to go there now to hunt for gold have no business there; that is, they have no right to go there, but there they will go and there they are going every day. It is the duty of the Government to prevent them from going there; but as the Government does not exercise that duty, what are the Indians to do? They are to repel the whites; they are to drive them away. How can they do it? Can they do it by gentle means? Can they do it by mild means? Can they do it by persuasion? They can only do it by using main force. To use main force leads of course to bloodshed, and bloodshed will lead to a war with them, because when they attempt to remove the lead to a war with them, because when they attempt to remove the frontier-men who go there, as a matter of course the whites will resist and the Indians will insist, and blood will be the result. That is inevitable. That will be the case this summer beyond doubt, because we do know that the whites are going there, right or wrong. They are wrong, but nevertheless they are going there and going in pretty large numbers.

The object of this bill proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs is to prevent that collision, is to send commissioners there to see these Indians and make them understand that the country is needed by the whites, that the whites are going there, and that as the whites will go there it will be better for them to submit quietly and receive a fair compensation for it. The sum of $50,000 was called yesterday, I think by two Senators, a corruption fund. To a certain extent that may be true, although it is not intended to buy Indians corruptly, but nevertheless it is an impossibility to negotiate any fair arrangement, call it agreement or a treaty, with the Indian tribes, unless you have presents to make to the chiefs. If you want to succeed, use those means that are necessary, means that have always been used, and without which you cannot succeed. Now the sum of $50,000, when you consider the number of Indians who are in that country, is really a very small sum. There are between forty and fifty thousand Indians on that reservation, not belonging to the two tribes headed by Red Cloud and Spotted Tail; but all the Sioux Indians who are intended to be embraced in the arrangement proposed to be made amount to forty or fifty thousand. The object is to embrace them all in an arrangement by which they will voluntarily abandon the Black Hills country, abandon the country where they have their agencies now, and move farther north and to-ward the Missouri River. Unless the commissioners have these means and appliances they cannot succeed. One reason why the commission did not succeed last year was because they had no means at their

Mr. MERRIMON. Allow me to ask a question. In negotiating this proposed treaty, will my friend designate some of the special objects for which the $50,000 are to be expended?

Mr. BOGY. The question of my friend from North Carolina—and

I wish to treat him with very great respect as well as kindness—shows that he is totally ignorant of Indian habits. You cannot treat with an Indian any more than you can with a Turk or an Asiatic without having presents. Why, sir, we heard the other day that in negotiating a treaty with the Grand Turk we had to give presents to his ministry; and it has been the law from the days of Alexander down with regard to the Asiatic tribes, and it is said these Indians are Asiatics. If they are, they have retained that habit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask if the practice has not sometimes pre-

Mr. EDMONDS. May I ask if the practice has not sometimes prevailed in Europe, to say nothing of America?

Mr. BOGY. It has prevailed all over the world, civilized and barbarian, and in all ages of the world; and it was a little observed when the "high joint" was here. It is, to a certain extent, a custom of all nations, not in the way of corruption. You cannot negotiate to-day a treaty with the Grand Turk without making a present to his ministers. It is not corruption; it does not mean corruption, although much fuss has been made over it in the House by some gentleman who spoke of it as remarkable that presents were bought in the city of Paris to give to those men. There is nothing wrong in it. It has been the custom from time immemorial that these presents are made to the ministry; and they are made in our country, and made all over Europe to-day, and very often in a very clandestine and very im-

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that it is not wrong because it has been the custom from time immemorial? Is that the reason why it is not wrong?

Mr. BOGY. That is an evidence that it is not wrong.
Mr. EDMUNDS. That would be evidence that stealing is not

Mr. BOGY. It is an evidence that it cannot be very corrupt when it has been sanctioned by the usage of centuries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. MORTON. I must ask for the regular order.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Indiana to pause a moment that I may have the consent of the Senate to proceed with this bill as soon as the pending measure is disposed of.

Mr. MORTON. If a vote can be obtained at once, I shall have no objection; but I am satisfied that this debate, will run on.

Mr. ALLISON. No; I say after your bill is disposed of.

Mr. MORTON. I beg pardon; I did not understand the Senator.
Mr. ALLISON. I will content myself with giving notice that I shall call up this bill as soon as the bill of the Senator from Indiana is disposed of.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, no question of so much importance as the one now under consideration has been considered by the Senate during the present session.

The bill proposes to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon. We are warned by the past to provide for the future. With the majority in the two Houses representing opposing parties, the time is propitious for passing a wholesome law which all the people will recognize as honest and free from party bias. We should take advantage of the favoring circumstances.

The Constitution reads:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. (Part of the twelfth amendment.)

Here are two distinct duties to be performed. First, the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates. That is mandatory, not directory; it is unmistakable. The President of the Senate, and none other, shall open all the certificates; not part, but all. He cannot perform this duty except in the presence of the Senate and House of Reprethis duty except in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives; not Senators and Representatives; not a mass convention of Senators and Representatives; but in the presence of the Senate organized and appearing in its organized capacity, and the House of Representatives there present, organized as such. So far, then, as opening all the certificates by the President of the Senate in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives is concerned, there is no dispute; but it is insisted by the Senator from Maryland that the President of the Senate must not only open all the certificates, but must likewise count the votes: that the act of countings to vote but must likewise count the votes; that the act of counting the votes is a mere ministerial act, and that the sole office of the two Houses, who are required to be present, is to witness the performance of these who are required to be present, is to witness the performance of these two ministerial acts, namely: the opening all the certificates and the counting of the votes by the President of the Senate. If he is correct in this construction, then there is no need of any law. It would be a work of supererogation. The Constitution in this regard executes itself. The two Houses are figure-heads, and part of an imposing pageant.
I dissent from this construction. The duty of counting the votes

I dissent from this construction. The duty of counting the votes devolves in the first instance, in my judgment, on the Senate and House of Representatives. Why the necessity of requiring the Senate to appear organized and ready for business, unless it has business? Why require the House of Representatives to be present organized, unless for business? The very fact that the two Houses are required to appear in their organized capacities strengthens the construction which I place on the clause in question.

Had the framers of the Constitution designed to confer on the President of the Senate the duty as well as power of counting the votes.

dent of the Senate the duty as well as power of counting the votes, then why does it not say so? Why not read, The President of the Senate shall * * * open all the certificates and count the votes? As the power is, in express terms, conferred upon the President of the Senate to open all the certificates, and is not conferred upon him in express terms or by implication to count the votes, we naturally conclude that the power of counting the votes was not lodged in the President of the Senate, but was lodged in the Senate and House of Representatives, then present by the mandate of the Constitution and organized for business, and none other being required to be present. This view is supported by the well-known rules of construc-tion and is consonant with right reason.

The second officer of the United States in rank opens all the certificates in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, and they, in his presence, count the votes. I say in his presence, because the Constitution says the votes shall then be counted.

If this view of the Constitution be correct, as I think it undoubtedly is, then it logically follows that Congress has the power to pass any law within the limits of its express or implied grants necessary and proper to carry out the foregoing provision of the Constitution.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MAXEY. Certainly.

Mr. EATON. He speaks of the two Houses being organized for business. Do I understand him to mean by that, that, when these two Houses meet together for the purpose of having the votes opened and counted, there are two organizations in the same room, one of the Senate and one of the House of Representatives?

Mr. MAXEY. That is precisely what I mean, sir. The Constitution says:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of depresentatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

The word "Senate" means an organized body; the words "House of Representatives" mean an organized body. If it was designed simply to open the votes in the presence of Senators and Representatives, it would have said so; but it says "Senate," which is an organized body; it says "House of Representatives," which is an organized body; and I hold that these two bodies as organized bodies are present, and I have argued that they are present for business, and I think there is force in that view.

The question then is, What law will most effectually secure a fair count of the electoral vote and to each State its undisputed and inestimable right of having its true and valid return of the vote of the people through the electors counted beyond peradventure

Now, I hold that the grant of power to and consequent duty upon the Senate and House of Representatives is a sacred trust of the very highest character devolved upon these two bodies for the soundest of

The Senators are the direct representatives of the States, or, if you please, the people of the States in their organized capacity under State governments, and the House of Representatives represent the people directly in their primary capacity, and the highest incentives that can impel man to honest action lie before them. These distinguished bodies organized for business, in order to proceed in an orderly manner without confusion, are presided over by the second officer of the Government. His incentive to honest action is of the highest character. Could there be a more enlightened court organized?

Now, as I have said, this duty of opening all the certificates and counting the votes is a trust reposed by the Constitution, the first in the President of the Senate, the second in the two Houses of Conthe President of the Senate, the second in the two Houses of Congress, and in no other body or persons whatever. It is in its nature like a personal trust, and can be delegated to no power on earth, and necessarily demands sound judgment and discretion. Would any one say that, when the Constitution says in terms "the President of the Senate shall open all the certificates," we, or any other power on this earth, can say "the President of the Senate shall not do this, but some other party we name shall do it?" Now, if the argument is sound, as I believe it is, that the two Houses are intrusted with counting the votes, we have no more right or power to take the authority out of the body of Congress to count the votes than we have to take out of the body of Congress to count the votes than we have to take away from the President of the Senate the power of opening all the certificates. It makes no difference that one is by express grant and the other by fair implication; the implied grant once established is just as binding, valid, effectual, and constitutional as the express grant. Therefore as in the case of the President of the Senate it is Therefore, as in the case of the President of the Senate it is clearly and in express terms a personal trust, so by fair implication the grant to the two Houses to count the vote is a personal trust, and cannot therefore be transferred to arbitrators, court, or commission not of the body, however exalted be the personages. If I am correct in my reasoning, it follows necessarily that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Frelinghuysen] falls. The amendment of the services of ment is as follows:

The difference shall be immediately referred to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the presiding officer of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House, whose decision shall be final. If the Chief Justice is absent or unable to attend, the senior associate justice of the Supreme Court present in the capital or other place of meeting shall act in his place.

And the same is true of the plan suggested by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Morton] on Thursday last, and which is:

That the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States shall be assembled in the chamber of the Supreme Court at the same time that the two Houses of Congress are counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President; and, in case the two Houses shall fail to agree as to which is the true and valid return as provided for in this section, the returns shall be immediately submitted to the said judges, who shall summarily decide which is the true and valid return, which return shall be counted.

The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] I do not say would be unconstitutional. It reads thus:

SEC. — Should the two Houses of Congress, acting separately, fail to agree as to which is the true and valid return of a State, then, and in that event only, the President of the Senate shall render a decision of the question, and such rendition shall be in favor of that return of a State which shall have received a majority of all the votes cast in both Houses of Congress, considered as if both Houses had cast their votes in joint meeting assembled.

I will say, however, that it does not address itself to my mind as sound. The theory of the Legislative Department of our Government is that Senators represent States in their organized capacities as bodies-politic, while Representatives represent the people directly in their primary capacity. The books tell us that "State" and "people their primary capacity. The books tell us that "State" and "people of a State of a State are interchangeable terms. The whole people of a State in their aggregate capacity as a body-politic are represented in the Senate by two men: Senators; and this without regard to whether the aggregate is great or small, so it is a State. But the House of Representatives, representing the people, is very differently constituted. The State of New York has two Senators and thirty-three Representatives; the State of Delaware has two Senators and one Representative. Now, manifestly, the vote of the Delaware Senators counted along with her one Representative would weigh more than Representative. Now, manifestly, the vote of the Delaware Senators counted along with her one Representative would weigh more than the votes of the New York Senators counted along with her thirty-three Representatives. Such a plan follows no analogy of the Constitution, is not in accordance with the theory of the Constitution, and is, I believe, not the safest or best plan; and this applies also to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] which made as follows: reads as follows:

If the Senate should vote for counting one certificate and the House of Representatives another, the joint meeting of the two Houses shall finally determine which shall be counted, by States, the representation from each State, including the Senators therefrom, having one vote; but if the representation of any State shall be equally divided, its vote shall not be counted.

The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper] is plausible and would seem to rest upon the supposed analogy between a total failure of the electoral college to elect and the case under con-sideration, which is a partial failure, in ascertaining by the concurrent vote of the two Houses how one or more of the States voted, whereby they would be thrown out and thus make a partial failure in the electoral college unless a plan is devised to save the vote, and his plan is presented, based I think on this supposed analogy. His amend-

And if the two Houses do not agree as to which return shall be counted, then that vote shall be counted which the House of Representatives, voting by States in the manner provided by the Constitution when the election devolves upon the House, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

Now the States as bodies-politic are directly interested in having true and valid returns of the people's votes through their electors. So are the people directly interested in their primary capacity. The question is not the same as that which arises in the House of Representation of the election of President devolves on that body. The election in the House takes place from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list voted for as President. There may have been more than three voted for. In that case the Representatives of the State or States whose people voted for one of the dropped candidates cast about for a second choice, and when the third man is dropped his supporters go to a next choice. But in the case in hand it is not at all a question of choice. It is a question of justice and common honesty. The question, and the only question is, Which is the true and valid return? Which represents truly the will of the people as expressed through the electors? In the one case politics have all to do. In the other case, if we are honest, politics have nothing to do. But as I believe Congress (always confining the settlement of this question within itself) can constitutionally adopt this plan, my opposition to it is that I do not think it the ally adopt this plan, my opposition to it is that I do not think it the wisest and best. Then can the question be constitutionally settled and the rights of the people and of the States saved by a plan alike just to all? The first section of the bill under consideration is, in my judgment, substantially correct. It looks to only one certificate from a State. If the two Houses agree, there is an end of it. If they disagree, the vote shall nevertheless be counted. This is according to well-known principles of law, and I have heretofore said all in regard to that section I care to say.

The second section, so far as it goes, is to me unobjectionable. The trouble is it does not go far enough to provide a remedy to meet an trouble is it does not go far enough to provide a remedy to meet an unfortunate case that has arisen in our history, and may again; that is to say, where two certificates come up from the same State, both seemingly of equal dignity and validity. What are you going to do about it? That section reads:

That if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate from a State purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, all such returns shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when assembled to count the votes; and that return from such State shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

This section rightly requires the President of the Senate to open all the certificates. If the two Houses agree that one is the right certificate, then there is no contest, and that certificate ought to be counted. But suppose one House votes that one certificate is true and valid, and the other House votes the other certificate true and and valid, and the other House votes the other certificate true and valid, then what do you propose to do about that? I asked that question of the Senator from Indiana the other day, and he replied that in that case the vote of the State would fall. He deplored this result, but saw no way then of avoiding it. That cannot be. We must give force and effect to every part of this constitutional provision, if this be possible. Justice to the States, to the people, to the whole Union, a sacred regard for the peace and stability of the Union, demand that this problem should be solved.

The clause of the Constitution under consideration reads:

The clause of the Constitution under consideration reads:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

Clearly all the votes embraced in the true and valid returns or certificates are to be then counted; not part, but all; not at some future time, but then. Now it follows that of those presented, one from each State, is the right return; but one House says one is valid; the other says the other is valid. It is no uncommon thing in Legislatures and courts that opinions divide; still in a judiciously organized court, or in a Legislature, we get a binding decision of the question. think we can here.

Clause 4, section 3, article 1, of the Constitution reads:

The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided.

Clause 5, same section, reads:

The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President f the United States.

Now here we have two organized bodies—the Senate and House of Representatives—required by the Constitution to be present when the certificates are opened and the votes counted, and the President of the Senate is also required to be present, and to open all the certificates. None others are required to be present. In an orderly proceeding, such as this great occasion demands, a presiding officer over these two organized bodies, assembled for a common purpose—the two bodies that comprise the Legislature of this Union—is necessary in the due order and eternal fitness of things. When these two bodies thus act the senior presiding officer should preside, to wit, the President of the Senate, and this bill recognizes this fact and so provides.

Section I, after providing for the assembling of the two Houses, goes on, in lines 7 and 8, * * * "and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer."

Now here we have an organization and a presiding officer over that organization. A Senate, separately organized, representing States, which, as an organization, can withdraw in an orderly manner, and the House, representing the people, which can in like manner withdraw. Their deliberations concluded, they return and report to the common presiding officer, who is the second officer of the Government, and ordinarily elected by the people, filling the double capacity of Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate. Suppose the House decides in favor of one certificate, the result is announced, and that is the vote of the House. Suppose the Senate decides in favor of the other certificate, the result is announced, and that is the vote of the Senate. Now these two votes are of precisely equal weight and equal dignity. In all like cases the vote of the presiding officer decides the question, and so it should be here, and in my judgment this is the true solution. The Senator from Maryland read the opinion of Chancellor Kent in support of his position. opinion read by him I think precisely accords with the opinions I have expressed. Chancellor Kent presumes that in the absence of all legislation the President of the Senate should count the votes as well as open all the certificates. It follows that in the presence of legislation devolving the counting of the votes in the first instance upon the two Houses the President of the Senate would not have such authority. But another valuable lesson is learned from this same opinion of Judge Kent. If in the absence of legislation the President of the Senate could count the vote, then a fortiori in the presence of legislation devolving this duty upon him, (he being part of the Senate, and thereby of Congress,) most assuredly, in a certain contingency, he could count the vote. he could count the vote

Now where the two Houses fail to agree it is the same in result as which case, applying the views of the distinguished chancellor, the count would fall upon the President of the Senate. The precedent relied on by the Senator was not a precedent under the Constitution, but a plan adopted to put the machinery of the new Government in motion under the Constitution.

I will recall to the minds of Senators a few facts of history at this point which perhaps throw some light on the precedent from which the Senator from Maryland has read. The Congress of the confederation was in session at the city of Philadelphia in 1787, at the same time that the convention was in session. The convention, having closed its labors, through its President, General George Washington, made report thereof to the Congress of the confederation. In that report you will find, over the signature of General Washington, this recommendation, (and I will read only so much as pertains to the question before us:)

That the Senators should appoint a President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President; and that after he shall be chosen, the Congress, together with the President, should, without delay, proceed to execute this Constitution.

Thus it will be observed that the purpose and design of this was to pass without a shock from the old Government under the Articles of Confederation to the new Government under the new Constitution; and as Congress had never yet sat, as the Constitution had not been set in action, as the machinery of government had not been put in motion, the convention which framed the Constitution recommended to the Congress of the Confederation this mode. The Congress of the Confederation submitted by a resolution the work of the convention to the States for their ratification or rejection. At the first session of the First Congress succeeding the ratification of the Constitution by more than nine States, this resolution was introduced, that a President pro tempore of the Senate should be appointed for the sole purpose of receiving and counting the electoral votes. It was not a precedent under the Constitution, but a precedent adopted for the very purpose of setting the machinery of the Constitution in operation. Therefore I think that precedent is not applicable to the

Where the presiding officer is President of the Senate pro tempore, then I think his State cannot be deprived of its equal vote in the Senate; still, while in this exceptional case the President of the Sen-

Senate; still, while in this exceptional case the President of the Senate pro tempore acts in a double capacity, I do not think it at all changes the conclusions to which I have arrived.

An objection has been urged that the Vice-President may be a candidate for re-election or for the Presidency. So may any man or men you select, if they possess the constitutional qualifications; so that if this proves anything it proves too much. In the argument I have made I have not in the slightest degree taken into the account what may be the effect on parties. I have tried to arrive at a plan constitutional, simple, and most likely to prove satisfactory to the whole people. In conclusion, permit me to say that I rejoice that so great people. In conclusion, permit me to say that I rejoice that so great a question has been all the way through calmly, deliberately, and intelligently discussed in a spirit of fairness and freedom from partisan spirit, and I trust the wisdom of the Senate will devise some plan to meet every phase of this great question with which both Houses of Congress and the country will be satisfied.

In view of what I have said, Mr. President, I would suggest, though it is not in order now, at the end of the second section to add:

But if the two Houses fail to agree as to which of the returns shall be counted, then the President of the Senate, as presiding officer of the two Houses, shall decide which is the true and valid return, and the same shall then be counted.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I do not come before the Senate to-day with any plan to remedy this great difficulty. Much has been said here which meets my approval, and many plans have been proposed for adoption; but I propose to discuss the question as a constitutional question, and I intend to present to the Senate the reasons why I cannot support the present bill, or any of the amendments that are now proposed.

The bill before the Senate implies so much that we ought all be loth to admit, that nothing but the strongest reasons should induce us to pass it even if we had the power. It presupposes contingencies and dangers that can never arise under a healthy administration of the governments of the States of this Union.

I believe that this bill involves a plain departure from the Consti-tution, and provides machinery for determining the will of the peo-ple in elections for President and Vice-President not warranted by that instrument.

In principle it does not differ at all from the twenty-second joint rule so much condemned by Senators on this floor. That rule authorized either House of Congress to throw out the electoral vote of a State or of ten States when objection was made to them. This bill gives jurisdiction to the two Houses of Congress to do the same thing in a less offensive manner; for it provides that, if objection be made to the certificate from any State, the vote of such State may be excluded altogether by the two Houses of Congress.

The second section goes much further than this, and provides that, if more than one return shall be received purporting to be electoral certificates, all such returns shall be opened by the President of the Senate; and it is left to the two Houses, acting separately, to say whether any returns from such State shall be received or not.

Let us analyze these sections, and see what cases they provide for. The first section provides for the case of a single electoral return from a State to which objection of any kind is made by anybody and stated by the President of the Senate. The moment objection is made this law gives to the two Houses of Congress authority to settle the disputed question by rejecting the vote of one State, or of ten States, if the two Houses should concur in such rejection. the two Houses should concur in such rejection.

The law does not inform us what must be the character of the objection or whence it must come in order to justify the exercise of such an extraordinary power or jurisdiction. Shall the objection be technical or substantial? Shall it relate to the form of the certificate, the authority of the electors who signed it or of the governor who certifies to their identity? Shall the objection prevail for the want of a seal to the certificate, or other formal requirements, or must it go to the very right and title of the persons claiming to be the legally-elected electors?

This part of the bill vests an absolute power of rejection in the two Houses, for it makes the vote of each State depend upon the will and pleasure of these bodies. I cannot imagine a case where there is but a single certificate of election in which either House of Congress or both Houses would be justified in rejecting it.

The second section of the bill provides for the case of two returns, a contingency that is hardly supposable except in a case of revolu-tion. The Constitution vests in the several States the power to select in their own way the electors for a President and Vice-President. Those officers, although vested with a duty which concerns the whole Union, are not officers of the United States. They are elected in conformity with the State laws, the same which govern the election of members of the Legislature, governor, and other local officials. They may be appointed by the Legislatures or they may be elected by the people of the several States.

The view entertained of their duties by the framers of the Constitution, as we know, was very different from that which now prevails regarding them. It was expected that they would exercise an independent judgment in voting for President and Vice-President. But we know that under the present practice they meet only to record the will of those who elected them. But the mode and manner of their election was left to the laws of the States. This of necessity involves the right to determine all cases of contest arising out of the claims of rival candidates.

The Constitution of the Union was created by people living under organized governments, and it was intended to operate over them only in that state. In construing the Constitution we must look to the view which was entertained by its framers of the powers of the electors. They are to be selected by the States in such manner as their Legislatures shall determine. It was intended that they should vote for whomsoever they pleased for the two first offices in this Government.

No person holding any office of honor and profit under the United States can become an elector. No Senator or Representative in Congress can become such. The selection of those officers was left exclusively to the States, and every question arising out of their election or appointment was left of necessity with the same authority. The laws of the States provide the manner in which these persons The laws of the States provide the manner in which these persons shall be chosen, and they may provide also who shall determine in cases of contest and difficulty, the persons who have been duly elected. Whatever may be the decision of the State authorities, or by whom made, it is binding on the United States. This bill proposes to take this power from the States and vest it in Congress, because I contend that the right of ultimate decision between two persons claiming a single office is a right which flows from the authority, and the authority least they orders and controls the election. Will save the authority alone, that orders and controls the election. Will any one deny that the States cannot provide by law for determining cases of contest between opposing candidates for the office of elector? If they can, and the tribunal fixed by the local law is vested, as it must be, with the right of exclusive judgment, how can the same power of decision be exercised by another authority under a distinct govern-

This power belongs either to the States or to the Union. If to the latter it cannot be reconciled with the express authority vested in the States by the Constitution.

But it may be said, Mr. President, that the object of the present law is to provide for the case of two rival governments, and that it is intended to give to Congress the power to decide between them when determining the electoral vote of the State. Sir, I protest against this dangerous doctrine. There is no such power vested in Congress or in either House of Congress. If this or the other House has authority to decide the question at all, it must be an exclusive authority, an authority from which there can be no appeal.

The Constitution contemplates that all the States of this Union shall always be connected with this Government by certain constitutional ties. In the very nature of things there never can be but one gov-ernment in a State with which this Government can have constitutional relations, or that can claim recognition from the authorities of the United States.

The governments of the original States, differing as they did in many respects, were all recognized as legal governments, and so were all the governments of the States admitted into the Union afterward. But the framers of the Constitution were far-seeing men, and they foresaw that it was possible that the State governments, having legal relations with that of the United States, might be overthrown by usurpation or domestic violence too powerful for the local authorities to resist. And what did they do? Did they leave the matter to be decided by one or both Houses of Congress when the electoral vote of the State was counted? No, sir. They made it the duty of the United States to guarantee to each State a republican form of government, and to protect them against invasion; and upon application of the Legislature or the executive against domestic violence.

It is impossible in the very nature of things that the lawful and rightful government of a State can be destroyed, or a rival power es tablished or put in operation, if this authority vested by the Constitution in the United States is faithfully and honestly exercised. It will be apparent that the Constitution contemplates that there will always be in existence in each State either an executive or a Legislature which will be entitled to make the application provided for in case of threatened danger to the local government.

It is true that it is not every case of local disturbance that will call for the exercise of Federal power. But I do say that this is the remedy provided by the Constitution for maintaining intact the law-ful governments of the States and to enable them to fulfill the duties which they owe to the people and to the United States.

What right have we to suppose that there will be two certificates from two sets of electors and two governors? The electors must all be elected under the State laws and certified by the governors of the States. These laws all provide for the canvassing of the votes by State officers, who are sworn to perform their duties. The governors are all sworn likewise to do their duty and are liable to impeachment if they willfully fail to perform it.

This bill looks only to the certificates of the electors; but it is manifest that under an authority to look into the certificate of the elector the right will be claimed, and may be exercised, to inquire into the election of the electors themselves.

Now, I wish to know if gentlemen are willing that either House of Congress, in any event that can be supposed or imagined, shall go into an investigation of an election in a State held for electors of President and Vice-President. And that is what this bill proposes to au-

Now, I say that it would be as just, as proper, it would be as constitutional to give to Congress the power to investigate State elections held for governor and other local officers as it would be to authorize the same body to investigate elections held for electors. This is a proposition which I defy any one to dispute.

The right of the States to elect or appoint electors, although derived from the Federal Constitution, is just as complete and perfect and independent as the right to elect a governor. The act provides that, if more than one return shall be received by the President of the Senate purporting to be certificates of electoral votes, that return shall be counted which the two Houses, acting separately, shall decide to be the true return.

The Houses are to withdraw to discuss and decide this question, and although debate is limited to two hours there is no limitation as to the time the investigation shall last or the range it shall take. On the contrary, the Houses, instead of being confined to the objection raised to the returns, may also decide any question pertinent thereto, and Congress is the sole judge of what is pertinent. And then the law, instead of providing that the main question shall be put after debate, simply gives the power to the majority to direct that it shall be put. Is it not known to Senators that elections take place in all States for Legislatures and State officers on the same day that the election is held for President; that both elections are held under the same law, by the same officers?

Now by giving authority to Congress, as is proposed by this bill, to decide upon the validity of an election held for electors, you open up the whole subject of State elections to the review of Congress. You give to this body and the other House the power to strike down the most essential rights of the States, and make the right to vote by ballot at a State election an empty privilege to be exercised subject to the control and censorship of Congress.

Why, sir, under the second section of this bill, either House of Congress can bring the whole returns of a State election here or can send a committee to the State and investigate anything and everything they please in connection with a local election. Yes, sir, and in defi-ance of State laws and constitutions, Congress can disregard the sanc-tity of the State ballot, and can force the citizen under oath to disclose how and for whom he yoted.

This is a power which never was intended to be lodged in either House of Congress. But it may be said that the bill only gives to the Congress the right to decide which is the true return, and that in the Congress the right to decide which is the true return, and that in the absence of some provision of law the same right will devolve upon the President of the Senate. I deny that this is so. The right to decide which is the true return in the case provided for by the bill, if it means anything, means a right of determining whether or not the electors who made them were legally elected.

How is this question to be settled? Certainly not by looking at the face of the returns. It can only be decided by investigating the primary election. The case contemplated by this law is not the case of double returns coming from the same body of electors—that is a case which is not supposed—but it is the case of two returns coming case which is not supposed—but it is the case of two returns coming from two rival bodies of electors.

In the first case the only question would be, who received the majority of the electoral body? But in the other case, and the only case which the second section of this bill provides for, the question always must be which of the rival bodies whose returns are before us was legally elected; and a mere statement of the proposition is enough to show to any mind what is involved in such an inquiry.

The President of the Senate is invested with no such power by the Constitution. It is true that it was expected that such a thing as two rival powers in a State might exist, but the Constitution did not intend to leave the decision of the claims of such powers to recognition to the judgment of either House of Congress. The President of the Senate was assigned a simple ministerial duty, to count the electoral votes in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, and in view of the safeguards provided against usurpations and illegal gov-ernments in the States it was not thought possible for any returns to find their way here except such as came from the local authorities of the States having recognized constitutional relations with this Government.

The United States had pledged all their power to the executives or Legislatures of the States in order to protect them against illegal au-thority. The simple recognition by President Tyler of the charter government in Rhode Island had the effect of ending the contest in that State between the rival powers. Suppose in that case the Dorr party had elected presidential electors and they came here with certificates, would there have been any trouble in deciding whether or not they should be received? The duty of the President of this body was the same at that time as it is now. Yet I imagine no one will say that he would have had any discretion to exercise in counting the vote of Rhode Island.

Mr. President, this Government was founded in a great part upon the virtue of the people. It was not expected, sir, that our rulers would require penal statutes to compel them to discharge their duty. When Mr. Webster was reminded that the States by refusing to elect Senators could stop the operations of this Government, his reply was that it could not be done except by blackening the souls of State officers with perjury. If we have arrived at that point when we cannot trust our highest officers in the discharge of their plainest duties because of their party feelings and prejudices, we may rest assured that all the legal ingenuity of this body will not be able to devise laws that will preserve the principles of our Constitution.

The first section of this bill, as has been said by some of the Senators who have spoken, is comparatively harmless. It provides for the case of a single electoral certificate to which somebody may make an objection, and thus devolve upon the two Houses of Congress the unpleasant duty of deciding the question. It is the second section that is so full of danger in my opinion. It attempts to provide a remedy for the case of two electoral returns sent here from a State.

Now I submit to the Senate whether it would not be better to try and prevent two returns from coming here than to undertake to constitute a tribunal to decide between them after they are received.

We know that it was never contemplated that more than one electoral return would come from a State. In the nature of things there can be but one legal return. It never was intended that the President of the Senate should receive more than a single certificate of the electoral vote of any State, and his duty under the Constitution is purely ministerial, to count the vote.

It never was the purpose of the Constitution that any contest whatever should be carried on here respecting the vote of a State for President and Vice-President. The danger in such a case depends not so much upon the fact of two returns, as upon the body which undertakes to decide between them. If the decision of the question is remitted to the State in which the contest arises it is impossible that any trouble can flow from it.

Senators have spoken with great force and emphasis of the propriety of following as near as possible the spirit of the Constitution in framing a law upon this delicate subject. Now does it not occur to every one that the great source of danger in this case lies in the jealousy between the State and Federal authorities?

If a State should fail to vote or should voluntarily refuse to send here her electoral returns, such contumacy could lead to no serious trouble. But if this body were to disregard the vote of a State, such action would excite at once a spirit of indignation if not resistance, unless the very clearest grounds and reasons could be given for such a proceeding. But, sir, the assumptions of this bill amount to the assertion on the part of each House of Congress of an arbitrary right of rejecting the electoral vote of a State. In the event of two returns coming here, that one shall be received which both Houses acting separately shall decide to be the legal returns. shall decide to be the legal return.

This language is calculated, I think, to create a misconception as to its true meaning. It may seem to imply a duty on the part of each House to canvass the vote and count in the return of the State. That is not the case. The sense of the section may be stated thus: When two returns are received by the President of the Senate from any State, the vote of such State shall not be counted unless each House of Congress acting separately shall so decide. I say that this amounts to an arbitrary right of rejection on the part of the two Houses of Congress.

There is no cause stated in the bill which must be found to exist before the State is disfranchised. There is no mode of trial pointed out which shall precede the judgment of the House upon this momentous issue. No provision is made for securing to the State interested an opportunity to be heard before a judgment is rendered against her. The Senate or the House may resolve to do this business in secret and exclude the world from all knowledge of the grounds of their decision.

The Constitution contemplates that the counting of the electoral vote and all decisions affecting it shall be made under circumstances which place it beyond the power of either House of Congress to withdraw their proceedings from the public gaze. We know that when they meet together in the Hall of the House of Representatives to witness the counting of the electoral vote they are beyond the operation of those rules and principles which were intended to control them in their legislative character. The two Houses can do no legis-lative business together, and the whole legislative power of the Union is vested in them in their separate character as Senate and House of Representatives

As I said awhile ago, it is insisted that the power of decision proposed to be given by this bill is the same that may now be exercised by the President of the Senate in the emergency stated; that this right flows as an incident from the duty devolved upon that officer to count the votes. This proposition is to me very illogical, for, if the President of the Senate has a right under the Constitution to decide all questions incident to the counting of the votes, how can Congress take it from him and vest it in another body? Upon the other hand, if no power of rejection is vested in the President of the Senate by the Constitution, such as this hill gives to the two Houses on ate by the Constitution, such as this bill gives to the two Houses, on what principle of constitutional law can it be claimed that an omis-sion in the Constitution to vest this power in any body or officer can furnish authority for the two Houses of Congress to confer it upon themselves?

The Constitution has provided the mode and manner of returning and counting the electoral votes. It took jurisdiction of the whole subject. Its sense and meaning are to be collected as well from what it has omitted as from what it contains.

When the great case of Gibbon vs. Ogden was before the Supreme Court of the United States Chief Justice Marshall, for a time, was very greatly embarrassed in his judgment by the powerful arguments were made at the bar.

Mr. Emmett, one of the distinguished counsel, maintained that, while the Constitution vested Congress with the power to regulate commerce, so long as Congress did not exercise the whole power, it was competent for the States to legislate in respect to any branch of the subject not provided for by some positive legislation of the General Government.

Mr. Webster replied (and this was the argument that impressed itself most upon the mind of the greatjudge) that, while there were some powers in the Constitution that were not in their nature exclusive and were not inconsistent altogether with legislation on the part of the States, still the commercial power was exclusive, and when this was conceded it was possible that Congress intended, by omitting to legislate touching a particular subject, to exercise the very power of regula-tion which was conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. Now, sir, there are some parts of the Constitution to which this ar-gument can fairly be applied when the question is whether a particular power is vested in Congress by the Constitution. I know that Congress is invested with the power to pass all laws which may be congress is invested with the power to pass all laws which may be necessary and proper for carrying out the powers vested in the Government or any officer or department thereof.

The authority proposed to be given to the Senate and House of Representatives by this bill cannot surely be derived from any of the express powers of the Constitution. There is not a word said in the article which contains the delegated powers on this subject of counting the electoral votes. All that the Constitution says in regard to the electoral vote is to be found embodied in the second article. That article provides the mode and manner of returning and counting that vote. If it was intended that Congress should exercise authority over this subject by general legislation, why is it that the Constitution, instead of giving as in other cases a general power to Congress, has anticipated such legislation by a lengthy provision specifying particularly the manner in which the voice of the electors shall be certained? It was not the intention of the Constitution to leave to Congress the power to determine how the President and Vice-President should be elected. This is clearly indicated by the express words of the first section of the second article. After vesting the executive authority in these officers, it provides that they shall be elected as

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

After having stated in detail how the election shall be held and the returns made, the very same section specifies the part which Congress may take in this important business. It says:

The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United

If the framers of the Constitution had supposed that Congress, under the general power to pass all laws necessary and proper to execute the powers of the Union, could determine the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they should vote, they were certainly at fault for having encumbered the Constitution with this unnecessary provision.

This clause shows that they weighed this subject with great care, and that they thought it necessary not to leave to Congress any implied power over the election of President.

Now, sir, the power to decide whether the votes of two or ten States shall or shall not be counted is a far more important and delicate power than that given to Congress in express terms to fix the time of choosing the electors. And am I not warranted in saying that, if the Constitution intended that Congress should have any more extended power than is conferred by this clause, it would have said so in plain language?

The right of Congress to exercise implied powers cannot be doubted. But it cannot be deried that, in exercising implied powers, we are limited by the purposes for which they were granted for carrying into execution the expressly delegated authority of the Constitution.

We may pass laws which are necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or any officer or department thereof. This is the language of the Constitution.

We have seen that all the power vested by the Constitution over the election of President is to be found in the articles of the Constitution which I have cited. This limits the authority of the two Houses over such election to the right of being present at the counting of the votes, and to fix the time of choosing electors and the places where they shall vote. Can we derive the authority to decide in the last resort between two electoral returns from a State from the power conferred upon us to witness the counting of the votes?

But, sir, I am free to admit that the evils apprehended by this bill and the several amendments proposed call for some remedy. And while I am well satisfied that we have no authority to give to either House of Congress, or to any other body or tribunal, the power to determine whether or not the electoral vote of a State shall be counted, I still believe that we have authority under the Constitution to I still believe that we have authority under the Constitution to so guard the rights of the lawful governments in the States as to render the difficulty which must flow from two returns impossible.

Now, sir, the guarantee clause in the Constitution was intended, first, to protect each State against invasion; secondly, against a usurpation of its government by preventing the overthrow of a republican form of government; and, thirdly, the protection of their governments against domestic violence. The guarantees against invasion and to secure a republican form of government were intended for the benefit of the people of each State, independent entirely of their State organizations. It was apprehended that the ambition of their local rulers, yielding to the influence or seductions of foreign enemies, might, as in the ancient confederacies, induce them to place the peo-ple under a foreign yoke, and subvert their local governments. Hence the right to interfere in case of invasion or to enforce the guarantee of a republican form of government is not made to depend upon the application of either the Legislature or the executive of the State; but the guarantee against domestic violence, which was intended to protect the local government, can only be made effectual when application is made in due form by the organs of such government the Legislature or the executive.

The object of the last guarantee was to secure to each State a single lawful government, and the whole power of the Union is pledged to secure that end. I am sure that I need not argue here that so long as there exists in a State but one legal government, with fixed relations toward this Government, such a difficulty as that provided for by this bill cannot arise.

Congress, as the representative of the sovereignty and power of the United States, is charged with the high duty of carrying out these guarantees. It is beyond doubt its duty to secure the rightful government of each State against such violence as may prevent its authorities fulfilling their duties toward the United States by electing Senators and electors.

When there are two legislatures and two governors, Congress must decide which of them is legal. This is what Chief Justice Taney called "political recognition." And when this is done, the acts and proceedings of the authorities so recognized, in the language of the Supreme Court, bind all the departments and the officers of this Gov-

The Supreme Court in the case of Luther vs. Borden decided that it was competent for Congress to designate a court and give to it power to decide when the exigency had arisen when the power of the United States should be interposed to protect the lawful government of a State. Why may not such a tribunal be designated now; one which is placed by the character of its judges above all suspicion of party bias or prejudice, and to which the whole country can look up with confidence when difficulties come upon us? If such a tribunal can be designated, or if Congress itself will exercise with fairness and justness this high power conferred upon it by the Constitution, you need have no fear, sir, that two electoral returns from a single State will ever find their way here.

It has been argued by Senators on this floor since this debate began that this is a judicial function; that the duty proposed to be given to the Senate and the House is judicial in its character. Some say that it is ministerial. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] says it is judicial. I have but this to say, in concluding my remarks, that if this be a judicial duty, I want Senators to answer me where this body gets power to delegate a judicial function to either House of Congres

The Constitution provides that all judicial power "shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." All legislative power by the same instrument is vested in the Senate and in the House of Representatives; and all executive power is vested in the President. If this be, as some claim it is, a judicial duty, I ask, Where is the power to give it to either House of Congress?

Mr. MERRIMON. Does not the Senate very often exercise judicial functions ?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not think so. If it does, it is without the warrant of the Constitution. No judicial function belongs to this body except in the single case where the Constitution invests it with such power. Mr. MERRIMON.

Mr. MERRIMON. The very question is whether the Constitution itself has not imposed the duty upon Congress to count the votes and decide all questions in connection with the count.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I admit that the case of deciding whether a person is entitled to a seat on this floor or in the other House is an exception, because the Constitution has made it an exception, and we may, in determining upon the right of a Senator to a seat on this floor, exercise judicial functions; but when it comes to the delegating of judicial power generally, I do not believe that this or the other House has any right to delegate it except to some court in accordance with the Constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Frelinghuysen] to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee,

[Mr. COOPER.]

Mr. EATON Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported. The Chief Clerk. The first amendment was offered by Mr. Cooper, to add to the second section these words:

And if the two Houses do not agree as to which return shall be counted, then that vote shall be counted which the House of Representatives, voting by States in the manner provided by the Constitution when the election devolves upon the House, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

The pending amendment of Mr. Frelinghuysen is to strike out all after the word "agree," in the first line of that amendment, and

The difference shall be immediately referred to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the presiding officer of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House, whose decision shall be final. If the Chief Justice is absent or anable to attend, the senior associate justice of the Supreme Court present in the capital or other place of meeting shall act in his place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is the one offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I thought the amendment of the Senator from

New Jersey was the one pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the pending amendment, being an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ten-

Mr. JOHNSTON. I so understood.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted-yeas 20, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conkling, Dawes, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Paddock, Robertson, Sharon, West, and Windom—20. NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Christiancy, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Whyte, and Withers—29.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER.]

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I suggest that the amendment had better be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the amendment. The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment offered by Mr. Cooper is in the following words:

And if the two Houses do not agree as to which return shall be counted, then that vote shall be counted which the House of Representatives, voting by States in the manner provided by the Constitution when the election devolves upon the House, shall decide to be the true and valid return.

The amendment to the amendment, offered by Mr. Johnston, is to strike out all after the word "and," in the first line of the amendment just read, and insert:

If the Senate should vote for counting one certificate and the House of Represent-atives another, the joint meeting of the two Houses shall finally determine which shall be counted by States, the representation from each State, including the Sena-tors therefrom, having one vote; but if the representation of any State shall be equally divided, its vote shall not be counted.

Mr. MORTON. I voted for the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Frelinghuysen] because if we are to establish an umpire to decide between the two Houses I believe his amendment much preferable to that offered by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Cooper.] I believe, however, the proposition to vote by States, whether the vote is to be cast entirely by the members of the House of Representatives or cast by them in conjunction with the Senators, to be the most objectionable plan that could be adopted.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am aware, Mr. President, of the difficulty involved in the solution of this question, nor do I undervalue its magnitude. I have given to its consideration the time and reflection which its importance demands. I have sought light in the ways of our fathers in the early Congresses. I have listened with great interest to the very able discussion which the subject has evoked in the Senate; and I frankly confess, sir, I have been unable to reach the conclusion that any of the legislation proposed by the pending amendments is sanctioned by the Constitution.

I concur in the able argument of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. I agree with him that the President of the Senate of the WHYTE.] United States is the only agency selected by the framers of the Constitution and named in that instrument as invested with the sole power of receiving, opening, and counting the votes for President as returned by the electoral colleges and of declaring the result of that election. The Constitution declares that-

The Constitution declares that—

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately choose by ballot one of them for President; and if no person have a majority, then from the five highest on the list the said House shall in like manner choose the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice.

Such I take to be the meaning, if not the very letter of the Constitution. Let us look to it as I have quoted it, words touching the duty of the Vice-President. The provision on this subject must be looked to as a whole and so construed as to make all its parts har-monize. The Constitution provides for the election of President of the United States. It was not by a direct vote of the people, but by a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled, but with this important exclusion that no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector. Mark that, sir. The Constitution further requires that these electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for two persons—one for President and the other for Vice-President.

These electors are required to make a list of all the persons voted for and of the number of votes for each; which list they shall sign and certify and transmit sealed to the seat of Government, directed to the President of the Senate. This was a singular and somewhat curious innovation upon popular suffrage. It was a well-guarded instrumentality of an electoral college through which the popular voice was to select the President and Vice-President instead of by a direct vote. It seems to have been especially guarded from congressional interference in forbidding any Federal officer to become an elector. When these electors had been elected by the people and cast their votes in such manner as the Legislatures of the respective States might by law declare, then the results of the respective ballots by these electors in each State for President and Vice-President were transmitted to the seat of Government, directed to the President of the Senate.

Then come the provisions of the Constitution already quoted by me above prescribing the duties of the President of the Senate touching these returns. No one doubts that the President of the Senate is to break the seals of the certificates from the electoral colleges as to the votes for President and Vice-President. No one doubts that this duty is to be done in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives. "And the votes shall then be counted." That is, the tellers are to put down the whole number of votes cast by the electors for President and Vice-President as shown by these certificates opened by the President of the Senate, and the result is then announced by him. This opening and counting by the President of the Senate is to be done without interference and without restriction, as I think, from any quarter. This is what I think is the true language and intendment of the Constitution.

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the two Houses, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. By whom? Clearly by him to whom they were directed; by whom they were opened; counted in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, as chosen witnesses selected by the Constitution to see that the certificates of the electors were all counted, and the results of such certificates to be recorded by the tellers; and the result was then to be announced by the President of the Senate whether any one had received a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, for President and for Vice-President. If so, then the persons receiving such majority for President and such majority for Vice-President were to be declared by the President of the Senate duly elected President and Vice-President of the United States. But it is insisted that because the Constitution does use the words "by the President of the Senate" after the words "shall then be counted," that the two Houses of Congress and not the President of the Senate are to count the votes for President and Vice-President.

I cannot concur in this construction. I do not believe that the two

I cannot concur in this construction. I do not believe that the two Houses of Congress are invested by the Constitution with any such power. I do not believe that the framers of that instrument ever intended that Congress should have any power or jurisdiction whatever over the certificates of the electoral colleges. Neither the spirit or letter of the Constitution clothes them with any such power. No provision seems to have been made for a contested election of President or Vice-President by the framers of the Constitution. To reach and provide for such a casus omissus the Constitution must be amended.

Had our fathers provided for such a contested election, I do not believe that they would have intrusted it to Congress. They were careful to guard all members of Congress and all Federal officers from being eligible as electors.

The very vice of the legislation proposed by these amendments is to give to Congress a power and control over the certificates of the electoral colleges that I wish to guard against.

The President of the Senate was the chosen instrumentality provided in the Constitution to open and break the seals of these certificates, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, count the votes evidenced by these certificates, and have them recorded by the tellers.

Nobody doubts the power of the President to announce the result of the ballotings of the electoral colleges when ascertained by an examination of these certificates. And yet there is no express words in this clause of the Constitution which declares he must announce this result. It is but a direct legal implication of precedent words. So I insist that the words "shall then be counted," following the words empowering the President of the Senate to break the seals and "open all the certificates," evidently mean that the counting shall be by him. Why, Mr. President, the whole counting amounts to nothing more or less than the enumerating of the action of the electors. It is merely ministerial. The President of the Senate cannot alter, suppress, modify, or change one iota of the results shown by these certificates from the electoral colleges. He merely ascertains the action of these electors and announces it. If no one has received a majority of all the electors appointed in the several States, then the House of Representatives is to elect the President, giving each State one vote.

If two candidates have received an equal number of votes for President and there is a tie, then Congress does not decide, but the House of Representatives is to choose one of them by ballot.

All these amendments assume a power in Congress over the presidential election which I utterly deny is conferred by either the letter or spirit of that great charter of liberty. At least as I read it—I beg Senators to pause—and as we have gotten rid of that odious joint rule which threatened such danger to popular government, let us stand by the action of our fathers until some amendment to the Constitution providing for, a contested presidential election is proposed and adopted. I may be blindly in error in despite of my efforts to obtain light, but I see nothing but mischief in these amendments. I see no warrant in the Constitution for their enactment.

I voted against the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. Frelinghuysen,] not only because we, in my judgment, have no constitutional power to select an arbiter to decide a presidential election but for recess of obvious impropriety if the recession.

election, but for reasons of obvious impropriety if the power existed.

It might so happen that the power of the Supreme Court might in some extreme case be invoked to settle judicially the title of an incumbent elected by the people to the Presidency; but, the certificates of the electoral colleges suppressed or their results not properly reported, I do not say that the Supreme Court are invested with such power. I see, however, that in the debate in 1857 on the counting of the electoral vote it was stated that the Supreme Court might be called on judicially to settle the title of a claimant under the popular vote to the Presidency.

I can without any stretch of fancy imagine a case—not very probable—where the people had clearly elected a President of the United States and the certificates showed a clear majority of votes of the electors as having been cast for him—if the President of the Senate should refuse in such case to announce the result of the vote of the electoral colleges, and in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives attempted, for any cause whatever, grossly to violate his trust by fraudulently withholding the certificates with a view of defeating the popular voice, that there might be relief afforded by the Supreme Court of the United States. I will not undertake to specify the mode. I will not say that the Supreme Court would possess such power. The very fact that such jurisdiction is barely possible is enough to defeat the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HOWE. I want to ask the Senator to what debate he alludes?

Mr. HOWE. I want to ask the Senator to what debate he alludes? Mr. STEVENSON. I think it was the debate in February, 1857, on the election of Buchanan and Breckinridge, when the vote of Wisconsin was counted by the President of the Senate although Wisconsin had voted on a day different from that prescribed by the act of Congress throughout the United States for the presidential election.

My recollection in that discussion is that at least one Senator stated that the power of the judiciary might be invoked in a case of wrong to pass on the election of President by the people in case of wrong or fraud. I do not remember that the statement was denied, although it may have been.

Mr. President, I deny that the power of Congress to witness the counting of the votes confers any power whatever upon that body to control the election of President, to correct any errors of the electors by exclusion, or to regulate a contested presidential contest. Still less can I consent to infer such a power from the clause relied on by the advocates of these amendments empowering the President of the Senate to open the certificates and count the votes in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Let us stick to the precedents of the early and better days of our fathers. John Langdon was elected President of the Senate especially to open and count the votes for President and Vice-President. For fifty years we went along under that practice, without mischief or bad results. Let us adhere to it. Let us not exercise doubtful power.

Mr. President, I will never believe, I cannot consent to believe, that any Vice-President or any President of the Senate will ever degrade himself, dishonor his country, and falsify his official vow by any improper tampering with returns and imposing on the people of the United States by fraudulently defeating the election of any one legally-elected President of the United States. If he did, he would promptly be impeached and hurled from office.

Mr. MAXEY. I would ask the Senator from Kentucky this ques-

Mr. MAXEY. I would ask the Senator from Kentucky this question: In view of the Blount case, suppose the President of the Senate should be a President pro tempore, and therefore not liable to impeachment?

Mr. STEVENSON. I suppose if he was President pro tempore he would discharge all the duties of Vice-President. The language of the Constitution is, the President of the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. But I ask if he would be liable to impeachment under that decision?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. MAXEY. In the Blount case it was decided that a Senator is not liable to impeachment. Suppose the President of the Senate is a President pro tempore; as a matter of course he is a Senator, and under that decision he would not be liable to the penalty.

Mr. STEVENSON. I cannot undertake to prescribe punishment in every extreme possible case. If not liable to impeachment, he would be subject to punishment civilly and to popular degradation. What offenses of the President of the Senate are impeachable is a question which I decline to pass upon without due consideration; but the Vice-President of the United States, who is usually the President of the Senate, is subject to impeachment, and he is the official to whom we look and to whom I have referred. If Congress possesses the power to legislate on the returns of a presidential election, why may not Congress determine who has been elected President of the United States? Why may not Congress then exclude States on some alleged irregularity? Where, if this power be legislative, is it to end? The Constitution makes the House of Representatives, voting by States, the electors of President if no candidate has received in the electoral college a majority of all the electors appointed. But if Congress can count the votes of the electoral college—count returns and exclude certificates of electors under its constitutional power—then I have no faith in the permanency of our free institutions. Never have I heard before of the existence of such a power. I look back for fifty or sixty years and see how harmoniously and beautifully the action and construction claimed by me have worked. I am unwilling to change it. I will not anticipate danger. We must trust somebody. It occurs to me that the safest and wisest course to pursue is to adhere to the precedents which for sixty years guided our fathers in the selection of Chief Magistrate. Let us guard the States from encroachments of arbitrary Federal power upon their suffrage. I am an old-school democrat; and I shall vote with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Whyte,] whose speech I listened to with so much interest and whose enunciations I so heartily indorse.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not think I should trouble the Senate with another remark on this subject; but the respect that I sincerely feel for the Senators from Maryland and Kentucky, who differ so widely from the opinion that I have expressed, compels me to say something more than I have already said.

How it could come into the head of any man looking at the Constitution alone and not looking at any usage under the Constitution to suppose that the power of counting the votes is conferred upon the President of the Senate, is almost past my comprehension. It has often been said that the framers of the Constitution, and especially that most distinguished man in letters, Gouverneur Morris, to whom the revision of the language of the Constitution was given, were masters of the English tongue; and that the Constitution itself is the most remarkable instrument to be found in the world for the clearness and terseness of its provisions. Let us turn to this provision and see what it is, and see what it would have been if the framers of the Constitution had intended what my learned friends suppose. The language is:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

If it were the intention that the President of the Senate should count the votes, would it not have been plainly said: "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count the votes?" That would have been a briefer expression than is used. That would have been an expression free from all ambiguity. That would have been an expression in good, plain Anglo-Saxon. That would have been an expression as clear as the intellect of Gouverneur Morris, the reviser of the language of the Constitution. But there is nothing of the sort. It is simply said:

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates—

And then it is saidand the votes shall then be counted.

Who is there who can say that the Constitution declares in express terms who shall count the votes? When it simply says, "and the votes shall then be counted," and says nothing more, who is there who can say that the Constitution in express terms declares that the Prescan say that the Constitution in express terms declares that the President of the Senate shall count the votes, or that it declares by whom the votes shall be counted? Manifestly there is no declaration on that subject. Manifestly it is not declared by whom the votes shall be counted. What is the consequence? These votes are to be counted, for they concern the election of the Chief Magistrate and the Vice-President of the Republic. The power to count them is a power conferred upon the Government, or some department or officer of the Republic. If, then, there is no declaration by whom they shall be counted I ask any lawyer in the Senate is there any alternative but counted, I ask any lawyer in the Senate is there any alternative but to say that the law-making power shall declare by whom they shall be counted? I ask any lawyer to say if it does not come within the express words of the last clause of section 8 of article 1, defining the powers of the Congress

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof?

And, without that clause in the Constitution, does not every one know that of necessity where a power is conferred upon a government or any department of a government by a written constitution and the mode of exercising that power is not prescribed, that mode is to be prescribed by the law-making power? Without that express provision in the Constitution, how could it be doubted that the law-making power is to supply the mode of ascertaining the popular will?

But the Senator from Maryland seems to think that this might deprive a State of its vote for President. He seems to think that if the President of the Senate had the power, no State could be deprived of its vote. With great respect for him, how can that be? Suppose the President of the Senate has the whole power to decide that a given return, where there is but one return, is not a valid return, has not this man decided that that State shall be deprived of her vote? the case of Wisconsin in 1857. If the President of the Senate alone had the power to decide that question, and he had decided it against Wisconsin, would not Wisconsin have been deprived of her voice in the presidential election? Take any other case that you can suppose, and if you give this one man this power, may you not deprive a State by his fiat, and even when he is a candidate, too, of her voice in the presidential election? Take the case of Louisiana at the last election when she had two returns sent here. If you give the power to decide that question to one man, the President of the Senate, may he not decide it wrongly and deprive the people of their just choice; or may he not do what we did, reject both returns and disfranchise the

How, then, do you get rid of the difficulty by conferring the power upon one man? How does that secure to the people their voice in the choice of their Chief Magistrate? No, sir; give this power to whom you please, to one man or a thousand, it may be that the people of a State will unjustly lose their right. You cannot help that, because there is no human tribunal that is free from imperfection. Until men shall be gods, pure and omniscient, there will be error in decision, and you cannot avoid it.

But, sir, this is not all in this matter—

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the fact that if this matter is to be left entirely to the President of the Senate, it includes the power to disfranchise a State where there is only one return because of an imperfection in the return? He may say that the return does not show that the electors voted by ballot, and in his judgment that should reject the return from a State; but that return would not be rejected under this bill unless both Houses concurred in saying that it should be rejected; or, where there were two returns, he might decide which was the proper one.

wo returns, he might decide which was the proper one.

Mr. THURMAN. But, Mr. President, there is something more, for this goes deeper. We have no Vice-President of the United States now; but we have a President of the Senate. This Senate by a large majority has declared that a majority on this floor can displace that President pro tempore whenever it pleases. It may change him from day to day. Now suppose the presidential election was so close that everything depended upon the rejection of the vote of a single State, it may be the smallest in the Republic. Sir, what have you done? You have placed it in the power of a bare majority of the Senate to displace tile President of the Senate if they fear that his virtue or displace the President of the Senate if they fear that his virtue or his knowledge will decide that question against their party wishes. I make no accusation against the majority of the Senate or against any Senator. I do not believe that all men in public life are villains, and I never did believe; but I repeat what I said the other day, that the greatest prayer our race has inherited is "lead us not into temptation." Besides, sir, what inducements would you have to change your presiding officer with a view to a count of the votes at the presidential election?

But again, it is said that the judiciary can interfere. How can the judiciary interfere? It is said that if the President of the Senate does not count the right vote, a mandamus may issue to him. Well, Mr. President, I am an old lawyer, and it is a long time since I began the practice of the law; and the idea that the President of the Senate, exercising a power quasi-judicial, as he must do if he is to decide between two returns, and which it is simply idle to call ministerial, can be controlled in the exercise of that quasi-judicial power, or that power not quasi-judicial, but really judicial in its nature, by a mandamus of any court, is to me the most astonishing proposition. And how would it work in practice, pray? Certainly the Supreme Court of the United States has no original jurisdiction to issue any such mandamus, unless, indeed, it is given under that clause conferring original jurisdiction upon it, which says that it shall have original jurisdiction of controversies in which a State is a party. Now assume jurisdiction of controversies in which a State is a party. Now assume for a moment that a State could be a party asking for a mandamus to compel—what? To compel the President of the Senate to count the vote of the State of Louisiana for A B. What is the answer to that mandamus? The President of the Senate answers, "I have counted it for C D; the thing is done; my function has ceased; I am functus officio in the business." That is the first answer to it. But suppose that the ruling power in that State coincides with the President of the Senate in the count that he has made; suppose, for instance that Kellogg is governor de facto of Louisiana and the Presidence of the Senate in the count that he has made; suppose, for instance that Kellogg is governor de facto of Louisiana and the Presidence of the Senate in the count that we have that Kellogg is governor de facto of Louisiana and the President of the Senate in the count that we have the factor of the Senate in the count that he has made; suppose that the last made is supposed to the senate of the sena stance, that Kellogg is governor de facto of Louisiana and the President of the Senate counts Louisiana for the republican candidate, although a majority of the votes of Louisiana have been given for the democratic candidate, how are you going to get your mandamus; how are you going to get the State of Louisiana to apply for a mandamus?

And, sir, when is that question to be decided? Certainly the Constitution requires the count of the votes of the presidential electors to be concluded without delay; and the President is inaugurated, and how then are you to proceed? Are you to proceed through one year, two years, three years, in some circuit court of the United States or in the Supreme Court of the United States, in order to find whether the President of the Senate correctly counted the vote, and then to have a decree of the court that he did not correctly count it, and then when you have got that decree, how are you going to turn the incumbent out? Suppose that the incumbent has a majority of both Houses on the side of his party, of what value would be your decision of the Supreme Court?

Sir, does not every one see that this gets us into inextricable diffi-culty? The man who is declared to be elected must be inaugurated. You propose, then, a litigation after he is inaugurated, for there cannot be an interregnum, and that litigation may last for years, and when that litigation is determined and the decision is against the man when that litigation is determined and the decision is against the man who is inaugurated, where is the power of the Supreme Court to enforce it? Where is its Army? Where is its treasure? How can it enforce it, and especially how can it enforce it if Congress is of the same political party with the President in possession? Is it possible that our forefathers, those whom we have been accustomed to venerate as men the wisest in the history of nations, as the fountain of government, as men before whom the Solons and Lycurguses of the world must hide their diminished heads—is it possible that they have framed such a government? I do not believe it. I believe that the Constitution is perfectly framed. I believe that our forester the not foresee the contingency that has happened. I believe, however, that the Constitution is a much more perfect instrument than it is supposed, for, though they did not foresee the particular case which has since arisen, it does so happen that that you can scarcely find a case that the language of the Constitution does not cover. That is the wonderful merit of our Constitution. It was well expressed by Chief Justice Marshall when, in answer to an argument that the framers of the Constitution never contemplated a particular case, he said, "It is not sufficient to negative a power that the framers of the Constitution did not contemplate that particular power or the exercise of that particular power; the question is, does the language of the Constitution cover the power?" Now, I say the language of the Constitution covers the power in this case; it makes it a legislative power to decide by whom and in what mode these votes shall be counted.

Now, sir, I want to stick to the Constitution as closely as I can. Inasmuch as the Senate and House of Representatives are called upon to attend the counting of these votes, I think for that and for other reasons that it was intended that this matter should be decided by the members of both Houses. I find that first in the fact that they are required to attend; I find it again in the fact that the Constitution requires that "the votes shall then be counted;" it admits of no delay. I find it in the fact that feet that if the votes shall then be counted; "I admits of no delay. I find it in the fact that if there is no above by the delay. I find it in the further fact that if there is no choice by the people, "the House of Representatives shall immediately proceed" to the choice. I find in all the facts an utter opposition to the idea of the delay incident to judicial proceedings, or any other delay. I think therefore that it was contemplated that this matter should be decided by the Congress or the members of Congress, and therefore I have been in favor and am in favor yet of so deciding it, either by the adoption of the proposition of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. Johnston,] or by that of my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. Randolph.] Either by treating the two Houses as a joint convention, and counting the vote of each member for one as in a joint convention, or by the mode proposed by the Senator from Virginia. I am in favor of deciding this vexed question.

I know very well that the decision can only be for a time. I feel as strongly as any Senator on this floor can feel, that the Constituas strongly as any Senator on this floor can feel, that the Constitution needs amendment in regard to the choice of President. I feel that the idea of electors of President entertained by our forefathers has in practice wholly failed. Their idea was that these electors were to make the choice of President according to their own good judgment and will. That idea has wholly failed. I believe that that cumbrous machinery ought to be dispensed with. I believe that it can be dispensed with, and yet preserve to the smaller States their relative weight in the presidential election which they now enjoy, and I believe it ought to be done. I believe that election who relative weight in the presidential election which they now enjoy, and I believe it ought to be done. I believe that some mode, clear and specific, free from doubt, ought to be constitutionally adopted for the counting and verification of the votes for President and Vice-President. But, sir, we cannot make a constitution in a day; we cannot amend the Constitution in a day. The necessity for action is a present necessity; it is upon us now, and the question is, shall we exercise that power which the Constitution does confer upon us, to provide for ascertaining the voice of the people according to the Constitution as it is ? tution as it is?

These considerations, and the firm belief that there is danger unless we settle this matter, induce me to hope that this Congress will adopt some measure which shall solve this problem. Certainly it is a difficult question; but that is no reason why we should not attempt

One word more, sir, and I have done. The Senator from Maryland read a passage from Kent. With great deference to him it seems to me that Kent's opinion is directly opposed to his argument. What is it that Kent says?

The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared.

Every one must admit that. Then Kent goes on to say:

In the case of questionable votes, and a closely contested election, this power may be all important; and I presume—

It is a mere presumption-in the absence of all legislative provision on the subject, that the President of the Senate counts the votes and determines the result, and that the two Houses are present only as spectators, to witn ess the fairness and accuracy of the transaction, and to act only if no choice be made by the electors.

"In the absence of legislative provision on the subject," which implies that if there is legislative provision on the subject the President of the Senate does not then count the vote and determine the result. That is what he means.

Mr. WHYTE. May I ask the Senator from Ohio whether Chancellor Kent refers to legislation in regard to organic or statute law for Mr. THURMAN. Statute law plainly.

Mr. WHYTE. I do not think so.

Mr. THURMAN. My friend, I think, will see that it must be so when he consider for property. If the Constitution gives to the

Mr. THURMAN. My Iriend, I think, will see that it must be so when he considers for a moment. If the Constitution gives to the President of the Senate the right to count the votes, no legislation can take it away from him; that is clear. Why then should Kent talk of the absence of legislative provision? Kent was a man remarkable for the clearness of his diction. His commentaries have won the hearts of all the law students in the country, not so much for their great great areas and breadth as for the wonderful clearness that their great grasp and breadth as for the wonderful clearness that marks them. Would be have talked in ambiguous language on this If the Constitution had said that the President of the Senate was authorized to count the votes, if the Constitution had conferred on him alone the authority to count them, would not Kent have said so? On the contrary, he says exactly the opposite. He says:

The Constitution does not expressly declare by whom the votes are to be counted and the result declared.

What, then, was in his mind? That which is in the mind of a lawer, and a great lawyer too, that the Constitution not having declared by whom the votes should be counted and the result declared, it necessarily followed that the law-making power had authority to act; and therefore he says that, in the absence of legislation, he presumes the President of the Senate declares the result, clearly recognizing that the law-making power had control over the subject.

Mr. President, I beg pardon for having occupied the time of the Senate again on this subject. I believe I promised the other day that I should say no more about it. I once more affirm, and I affirm it in all sincerity, that if it were not for the real respect I entertain for the legal and statesman-like opinions of my friends from Maryland and Kentucky, I should not have said one word to-day.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to add a solitary additional word. I had no purpose whatever of entering into the debate. I was not prepared to do so. I rose briefly to state before the vote was taken the ground upon which my opposition to these amendments would rest. The able arguments in their favor by political friends with whom I usually agree seemed to demand that much from me. The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Thurman,] for whose opinions I have the highest possible respect and in whose judicial construction of any legal or constitutional question I have the greatest confidence, has replied to my few desultory observations at some length and with some animation. He seems to think it profoundly strange that any human intellect should seriously persuade itself that the President of the United States was the constitutional instrumentality through which the votes of the electoral colleges in the several States for President and Vice-President dent were to be counted.

I am somewhat surprised—perhaps as much so as my friend from Ohio—at this broad expression of wonder on his part for opposing views on any part of the Federal Constitution. It is an instrument whose opposite constructions has arrayed in fierce opposition parties and men from the moment it was ratified by the States. The fathers and men from the moment it was rathed by the States. The fathers who framed it have differed widely and warmly as to the true construction of many of its provisions. That antagonism of construction still continues. It seems to me somewhat strange that when the views entertained by the Senator from Maryland and myself of the precise clause of the Constitution which we are discussing was sustained by the usage and practice of our fathers for fifty years. tained by the usage and practice of our fathers for fifty years, the Senator from Ohio ought not to wonder that we still adhere to them. think the language of the Constitution not less than the early precedents fully sustain us.

John Langdon was one who framed and signed the Constitution of the United States. He was, as the record shows, elected President of the Senate of the United States in the First Congress for the sole purpose of counting the votes of the electoral colleges in the States for President and Vice President. He did open and count them; a power which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] wonders that any human intellect should conceive was conferred by the Constitution on the President of the Senato. The message sent from the Senator III and the Maria States are the states of the Senator III and the Senator III are the states of the Senator III and the states of the Senator III are the states of the states o ate of the United States to the House of Representatives by Mr. Ellsworth was that John Langdon had been elected President for the express purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of skippess purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of President and Vice-President of the United States. Oliver Ellsworth, who bore the mes-sage, and John Langdon, whom the Senate made its President, and who did open and count the votes for President and Vice-President in the First Congress of the United States, were both members of the convention which framed the Constitution, and they took the same view of this question entertained by the Senator from Maryland and myself; and yet in their time no wonder was expressed in any quarter as to their construction of this clause of the Constitution. So far from it, that construction which clothed the President of the Senate with the sole power of opening and counting the certificates of the electoral colleges of the vote for President and Vice-President of the United States was sanctioned by the uniform and unbroken usage of Congress for fifty years continuously from the beginning of the Government.

The claim of power by Congress over these certificates of the electoral colleges certifying the votes for President and Vice-President, and which is asserted in the pending bill, was, so far as history and precedent go, absolutely unknown to the framers of the Constitution and to the members of the early Congresses. This is a most astounding fact if any such power existed. If there is any fact patent in the Constitution it is that Congress was expressly excluded by the letter and spirit of the Constitution from any power to interfere with or control the certificates of the electors certifying the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States. The Senate and House of Representatives were the chosen witnesses of the Constitution to see that the President of the Senate received, opened, and counted all the certificates of the electoral colleges; that the tellers duly recorded the same, and that the President then faithfully announced the result of the election as evidenced by these certificates of the electors. What is there, then, to astound or surprise the Senator from Ohio that any Senator now on this floor should feel disposed to follow the framers of the Constitution in the construction and practice under this clause The wonder, it seems to me, should be how so of the Constitution? acute a lawyer and orthodox a constructionist as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] undoubtedly is should abandon the old landmarks of the fathers, ignore their usage of construction of the Constitution for one doubtful and dangerous. The Constitution declares open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of

In their presence, do what?

Mr. THURMAN. Allow me to interrupt my friend.
Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.
Mr. THURMAN. I ought to have mentioned perhaps that the reason of those proceedings in the First Congress is very plain. The Constitution provides that the Vice-President shall be the President of the Senate. Until it was declared who was elected Vice-President there was no such presiding officer of the Senate as the Constitution provided for; and it was necessary to have somebody for the simple and sole function of having the votes counted, and that Senate could do not one single act except count those votes until it had a Vice-President to preside over it. Hence in order to show that the Senate was not to do any legislative act or any other act whatsover, and in accordance with the recommendation of the convention which was read by the Senator from Maryland, John Langdon was selected President of the Senate for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President and Vice-President. The language is not so clear at all that it would purport that he should count them, though I grant that he did it. But the reason why that limitation was put

I grant that he did it. But the reason why that limitation was put on the resolution, that it was for that sole purpose, was simply to disclaim any power in that Senate to do any act until it had the presiding officer provided for by the Constitution.

Mr. STEVENSON. Why, Mr. President, the reason given by the Senator from Ohio is no reply to the argument which I present. Why? Because the language of the Constitution is, the President of the Senate shall open, &c.; and the office of President of the Senate is an office created by the Constitution as much as the office of Vice-President. It was the President of the Senate—whether Vice-President. ident. It was the President of the Senate-whether Vice-President or President pro tempore—who is empowered and designated to open and count the votes. He did it in a ministerial capacity. He had no discretion. He was the instrument of the Constitution of making known, after opening and ascertaining from the certificates of the electoral colleges in the several States, the result of the ballots of their electors for President and Vice-President. He had no power to exclude, alter, or withhold one solitary certificate sent to him by the electoral colleges. The Senate and House of Representatives were to witness the discharge of this constitutional duty by the President of The tellers were to record the votes for President and Vice-President evidenced by these certificates, and the President was then to announce the result. If the certificates showed that a majority of all the electors of all the States had voted for one man as President, he was then to be declared elected by the President. If

All the dangers of double returns, &c., that the Senator from Ohio speaks of now existed then; and yet the wise and patriotic men who framed the Constitution, and who were then members of the Senate of the United States, elected John Langdon President of the Senate to open and count these certificates of the electoral colleges. The Senator from Ohio admits that he discharged that duty of opening, counting, and proclaiming the result. And that usage continued for The tellers were and are mere clerks, as I think, to years and years. record the result of the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President, as opened, counted, and announced by the President of the Senate. That result, the fact disclosed by those certificates, untouched, uninterfered with, was beyond the power of either House of Congress, or of both combined. Our fathers intended to guard the votes of electors from all congressional interference of any and every votes of electors from all congressional interference of any and every sort. They were wise and far-seeing men. They made no provision in the Constitution for contested presidential elections. I was amazed to hear the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] say that this power of Congress to count the votes, and regulate the same by law, was a legislative power. I deny it. Congress has no legislative power whatever over the result of the electoral colleges in the States in electing President and Vice-President. President and Vice-President.

The Senator from Ohio attempted to deduce the power from that clause of the Constitution conferring on Congress all authority, legislative authority, to effectuate certain granted powers. That clause has no application whatever to the subject of the election of President and Vice-President by the people of the States. Congress cannot interfere with that subject. If there is a tie in the electoral college or no candidate has received a majority of all the electors, then the House of Representatives is to elect, each State having one vote. I rejoice that Congress has no legislative power in counting the votes of the electors for President and Vice-President. Whenever such a power is usurped and exercised then our constitutional liberty becomes extinct. Neither House of Congress can reject the vote of a State, singly or combined. The only constitutional function assigned to Congress is to witness the opening of the votes of electors as certified to the President of the Senate and counted by him. Their duty is to witness and see that every return is opened and counted and the result as shown by the certificates of the electoral colleges is correctly reported and correctly announced.

Had Congress the power to count and regulate these returns, then Congress can regulate the election of President and Vice-President. If Congress can count the vote of one State and exclude another within the discretion of a majority, who shall measure the danger in high party times, or in times of great venality and corruption, the grant and exercise of such a power?

When I look to the language of the Constitution, or to the contemporaneous action of the early Congresses, when the President of the Senate alone exercised this power of opening and counting the votes, I am surprised, I confess, to find that this bill should, without some amendment to the Constitution, find among its supporters my distinguished friend from Ohio. I have listened with attention and interest to all his speeches, hoping that he would show the grant of constitutional power which sanctions this amendment. I confess I have neither seen nor heard it. The language and precedents of the early Congresses are all against the existence or the exercise of so dangerons a power.

Is that circumstance entitled to no weight? Are we to overturn all the rules of construction which look to the opinions and contemporaneous action of those who framed the Constitution and put the Government in operation as evidence of its true intendment and meaning? Is action of Congresses for fifty years in allowing the President of the Senate to count the votes to be utterly disregarded?

What says Chancellor Kent on this subject? I beg the attention of the Senator from Ohio to a word or two from him. He says "that the two Houses are present"—to count the votes? No, sir. The two Houses are present for another purpose. What is it? "As spectators, to witness the fairness and accuracy of the transaction." What transaction? Opening the seals; counting the vote of the electors in every State as certified by their colleges to the President of the Senate, as the sole instrumentality which the Constitution designates for the discharge of that duty. If this power be possessed by the two Houses of Congress as a legislative power, it must follow that the power to correct and to revise, to set aside and to add to, can likewise be exercised by them. Yield the legislative power to Congress, as claimed in the pending bill and amendments, and all the rest follow.

Our fathers would not allow a Federal officer or a member of Congress to be an elector; but their children propose to allow Congress the power to count and control the returns of the electoral colleges. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to make

Mr. WHYTE. suggestion?

Mr. STEVENSON. With the greatest pleasure,
Mr. WHYTE. It is a remarkable fact that in the convention the proposition originally agreed upon was that the President of the Senate should in the presence of the Senate open the certificates, and the votes should then and there be counted. That was the original report; but on motion the House of Representatives were included as spectators; and the words "in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives" were put in after the word "counted." In the redraught of the Constitution those words are before the word "counted," but by the vote of the convention it was provided that the certifi-cates should be opened and counted in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. STEVENSON. The fact stated greatly fortifies our construction which so surprises the Senator from Ohio. I thank my friend from Maryland for his pertinent suggestion. It is another fact going to show that the framers of the Constitution looked to the President of the Senate as constitutionally empowered not only to open but to count the votes certified by the electors to him. Chancellor Kent tells us the House and Senate were to be spectators of the accuracy and fidelity with which he discharged that duty, and further, that the tellers were to record what the certificates evidenced had been lone by the electoral colleges in voting for President and Vice-President. The President of the Senate opened and read the returns. The tellers recorded the votes.

It is with extreme deference that I find myself differing on a question of constitutional construction with lawyers so eminent as the Senator from Ohio and others who coincide with him. But, tested by the language of the Constitution or the usages under it, I am con-strained to believe the bill wholly unconstitutional.

I agree with my friend from Ohio that human nature is not perfect. There may be dangers and difficulties that await us whatever construction shall prevail. I can see more from my stand-point as likely to flow from his construction than from mine. Nothing so appalls me as to hear the honorable Senator from Ohio say that Congress possesses the constitutional power to count and regulate the election of President and Vice-President; to prescribe when the vote of a State may be counted and when it may be rejected. The possession of such power is the tocsin of danger to free elections.

Mr. THURMAN. I beg my friend to allow me to ask him how he will avoid that by allowing one man to analyze the vote?

Mr. STEVENSON. I reply that if he is the sole instrumentality named in the Constitution to receive, open, and count the certificates of the electoral colleges showing the votes for President and Vice-President in the States and certified to him, we have no power to disregard that mandate of the Constitution. It has operated well in the past; let us adhere to it. If we desire a change let us amend the Constitution. If a Vice-President ever sought to degrade himself by improper conduct in withholding returns or counting false ones, we would soon reach him. The Senator says that he never heard of the Supreme Court of the United States in exercise of its original jurisdiction issuing a mandamus.

Mr. THURMAN. No, I did not say that.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will state directly what the Senator did say.

He said be had never heard of a case where the Supreme Court granted a mandamus in the exercise of its original jurisdiction. The Senator said he would like to hear of it. I will cite a memorable case to the Senator of the exercise of such original jurisdiction by the Supreme Court against a governor of a sovereign State, and that governor a governor of Ohio! I refer to the case of the State of Kentucky vs. Dennison, reported in one of the Howard Supreme Court Reports. The governor stands to the State in a position somewhat analogous to that occupied by the President to the United States. When William Dennison, the governor of Ohio, some years ago refused to deliver up to the governor. ernor of Kentucky a fugitive from justice escaping from the latter State, ernor of Kentucky a ingitave from Justice escaping from the latter State, on a requisition made by the governor of Kentucky, which, by the mandate of the Constitution of the United States he was directed to do, the State of Kentucky applied to the Supreme Court of the United States—an exercise of its original jurisdiction—for a mandamus against him to compel him to do his duty. The jurisdiction to issue the writ by the Supreme Court of the United States was denied by the attorney-general of Ohio, but the plea was overruled. The court held that they presented the autorney is not be written as invertible. that they possessed the power to issue the writ against Dennison as governor of the State of Ohio, who they held was in default in not surrendering the fugitive to the governor of Kentucky. They decided, however, that they had no power to coerce a State or its governor.

I will say that the Supreme Court of the United States would or would not undertake to require the performance of a clear ministerial duty by an officer whom the Constitution of the United States has named and designated for receiving, opening, and counting the votes of the electoral colleges for President and Vice-President. I will never allow myself to believe that the President of the Senate elected of any political party will be so far recreant to his duty as to require the exercise of such a judicial power. I will never believe it. If such an instance should ever occur, I have no doubt a remedy will be found. Therefore I say "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." No such instance has occurred in the past. None such is likely to occur in the future. If it does, I neither assert or deny the power of the judiciary to afford relief by a proper correction. The danger of abuse is more likely to occur by allowing Congress to interfere with the returns of the electors of the States. We have had a dark experience of what Congress has done and may do again with some of the States. Let us beware!

My friend from Ohio need not be amazed that any human intellect should undertake to construe the Constitution as the Senator from should undertake to construct the Constitution as the Senator from Maryland and myself propose to do. Abler and more distinguished Senators than either of us have reached the same conclusion. Jacob Collamer in his time was regarded as a pretty good lawyer; he was primus inter primos before any judicial forum, and as a leading and prominent Senator from Vermont for very many years in this Chamber he was regarded primus inter pares. He construed this clause, in 1857, as I do. He thought the President of the Senate could alone count the votes of the electoral colleges. I repeat, Jacob Collamer believed in no power of Congress to count votes or to evelude votes believed in no power of Congress to count votes or to exclude votes as certified by the electors. This statesman saw none of the dangers as certified by the electors. This statesman saw none of the dangers now pictured as likely to occur if we do not pass this bill.

Mr. President, I have been drawn unexpectedly and reluctantly into this debate. Now I have spoken hurriedly and without preparation. I have no feeling on the subject whatever. I have tried to gain light from my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. Thurman] to guide me in my vote on the pending bill. I have listened to him attentively. His learning, his clear, discriminating intellect entitle his utterances to respect, not only in the Senate but everywhere else. He has, how-ever, failed to persuade me that the Constitution authorizes Congress to pass this bill. We have gotten rid of that hateful joint rule whose pernicious operation was acknowledged, a rule which should never have been adopted and was always pregnant with danger.

Let us come back to old landmarks, and let us stand where our fathers stood so safely and so long. Let us not exercise doubtful powers or seek to clothe Congress with unlimited discretion to interfere with the certificates of the electoral college, and thereby control indirectly the election of President and Vice-President. Let us continue to trust the President of the Senate with the power confided to him by the Constitution of the United States, exercised in the presence of both Houses of Congress as chosen witnesses of that solemn and august ceremony in which he only announces to the Senate and to the House of Representatives the action of the electoral college in selecting the President and Vice-President of the United States.

What a solemn scene it is, occurring, as it does, once in every four years of our political calendar. No man lives with the true spirit of American liberty in his heart who does not feel that heart beat quicker when we, as we do in every quiet and peaceable election of President and Vice-President of the United States, give to the despotisms of the Old World new and enduring evidence of man's capacity for self-government.

I think Mr. President, we had better stand where we are. I see possible difficulties, no matter what Congress shall do. It is impossible to guard against possible danger. Let us adhere to the limitations of the Constitution and seek to restrict, not to enlarge, congressional

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, at the risk of being very presumptuous, I propose to say a word or two in the discussion of this question. I am no lawyer, and consequently do not propose to quote any legal authorities for or against any proposition which I may advo-cate; but I am inclined to take what we call in our country a plain, common-sense, plantation view of this question. I am the more disposed to do this from the fact that I find gentlemen of the highest legal attainments and reputation who rely upon precisely the same authority and the same paragraph and the same sentence to prove identically opposite propositions.

I have listened with great attention to the whole of this discussion. When I first suggested the difficulty which presented itself to my when I first suggested the difficulty which presented itself to my mind upon reading the bill as it was proposed by the committee who reported it here, I thought that it was a manifest defect; that the bill provided no agency by which the decision of the vexed question of double returns coming up from a State could be settled, thereby risking the loss of the electoral vote of that State. I think that the progress of this discussion has demonstrated that the objection was well taken; because it is admitted by a large proportion of those who have discussed the question that some agency or other should be provided, if indeed it does not already exist, for the contingency which the second section proposes to meet.

Now, the discussion has drifted off into two great channels, if I may so express myself. One is upon whom the constitutional right devolves to count the vote of ordinary elections. The other is the proposition for which the amendment of my colleague was designed to furnish a remedy; and that is, what course shall be taken in the case where two returns come up from a State each claiming to be the proper return of that State. With regard to the first, I shall have very little to say beyond this, that the argument of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Whyte] was, to my mind, almost conclusive on the subject that the framers of the Constitution designed that the duty of counting the votes should devolve upon the Vice-President of the United States. That the Constitution does not explicitly thus provide is true; but the argument of those who have urged that, because of the absence of that specific provision, we were therefore to assume that the power did not exist there, but that it existed to a much greater degree with the law-making branch of the Government, I think, is defective in this, that while the ministerial agency of the Vice-President is invoked by the Constitution to a certain degree in the ceremonial of deciding this question, to wit, in opening the vote, and while it is true that it says that vote shall then be counted, without specifying that the Vice-President shall count it, there is not one word of the agency provided by the Constitution which shall be played by the legislative branch of the Government further than that they shall be then and there present. No ministerial function under the Constitution devolves upon them at all. They have no right, so far as the Constitution shows us, of touching the returns in any manner, shape, or form. When I take this fact into consideration, coupled with the additional circumstance that clearly at the first meeting of the Senate and House of Representatives after the adoption of the Constitution the President of the Senate did not only open the vote but count it, and the additional fact that at the next presidential election the same duty was performed by the same officer, I think the objection of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] can scarcely hold good when he asserts that it is a most remarkable exhibition of the wonderful obliquity of intellect on the part of any person to suppose that under the Constitution the Vice-President was intrusted with this power.

The Senator with his usual ability brought to his aid the force of the argument based on the primary action under this Constitution by asserting that the then President of the Senate, Mr. Langdon, was elected for the sole purpose of opening and counting the vote, for the reason only that the Senate had not been organized under the Constitution and that there had been no organization of Congress under the Constitution. It seems to me, taking another branch of his argument and considering it in this connection, that if the legislation necesment and considering it in this connection, that if the legislation necessary by Congress under the Constitution to designate the officer or power that should have the right to count the vote had never been had previously, it was then had. The very resolution which empowered Mr. Langdon to preside for the sole purpose of opening and counting the vote was legislation, defining on whom this trust should be imposed. Therefore we have the additional precedent established by the election of Mr. Langdon for this purpose to show that it was the intention of the Constitution that the power should rest in the hands of the President of the Senate.

hands of the President of the Senate.

We have had arguments pro and con on the question upon whom the counting of the votes should devolve. One is sustained by the implication which I have mentioned, the only legislation which has ever been enacted by Congress upon the subject, pointing to the President of the Senate as the person by whom this duty should be performed, in the absence of a contrary or a specific provision in the Constitution that the Vice-President should perform it. There is not one word in the Constitution, there is not a letter or a syllable in it, to indicate by indirection or by implication that the duty hould devolve upon any one else.

Assuming, however, that this duty under the Constitution could be properly exercised by the Vice-President or President of the Senate, I cannot go beyond that point and declare that, because of this legislative provision and because of the action under it, the Vice-President or the President of the Senate should also be intrusted with the power of deciding as to the validity of returns when two conflicting returns present themselves. That is a different question. The first action, the counting of the vote, is clearly ministerial. The last action is by no means clearly ministerial. When two conflicting returns come up, whoever decides as to which is the valid return exercises certainly a judicial function. It seems to me that that point is irrefutable. It cannot be urged that it is ministerial, or that it is executive, or legislative. He has to exercise the power of judgment in the matter.

cannot be targed that it is ministerial, or that it is executive, or legislative. He has to exercise the power of judgment in the matter.

Just here I will say that while I favor the proposition of my colleague, [Mr. Johnston,] for reasons which I will state more at length hereafter, no difficulty is presented to my mind by a proposition to vest this power in the House of Representatives, in a joint session of the two bodies, or in a vote by States; because, while it is true that the Constitution clearly separates the powers which are wielded by the Government into three great branches, executive, legislative, and judicial, yet there are certain great functions which must devolve, and do devolve, by the Constitution upon these legislative bodies. These functions are not only discretionary, but judicial, for the Constitution specifies that this body "shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members;" and so with the lower House. In cases of impeachment, the Senate constitutes the highest judicial tribunal known, and must of necessity exercise judicial powers. I, therefore, see no constitutional difficulty in providing by legislation that this judicial power shall be exercised either by the Vice-President, or by the House of Representatives, or by the Senate and House of Representatives. I think it is clearly competent for the law-making power to delegate this judicial duty to any or all of these.

The principal proposition, after the amendment offered by my col-league, is the one which proposes to substitute the judges of the Supreme Court as the umpire to decide in cases of doubt. to me that there does exist a constitutional difficulty in that case. The argument of the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. Mor-Ton] the first day this question came up for discussion was to my mind perfectly conclusive and satisfactory, that we could not under the Constitution, and with a due regard to its provisions, delegate this duty to the judges of the Supreme Court; whether they acted as a Supreme Court, or whether they acted merely in their individual capacity, which the amendment suggested by the Senator from Indiana contemplates, for two reasons: First, the Constitution requires that the decision shall be then made; and it contemplates the presence of no person other than the Vice-President and the two Houses at the time the decision is made. If the Constitution had contemat the time the decision is made. If the constitution had contemplated the possibility of any power other than those mentioned discharging any duty which might directly or indirectly spring out of the performance of the function of counting the vote and declaring the result, it would have provided some means by which we should have a right to know that this additional tribunal was authorized by the Constitution; but no other person, so far as the provisions of that instrument go, is contemplated to be present, or anywhere near; and in addition the Constitution requires that the question shall be then decided. More than that, the judges of the Supreme Court may possibly themselves be called upon in their judicial capacity to decide sibly themselves be called upon in their judicial capacity to decide upon questions which may arise under the action which is taken in Congress at the time the vote is counted. I do not pretend to designate the quo modo in which the case may come up for their adjudication; but that such an event is possible I think can scarcely be denied. That being the case, it would be manifestly improper to require the Supreme Court to act as umpire in the decision of a question which they might subsequently be called upon to decide as the highest judicial tribunal of the land. Although it may be asserted that in the one case they would act in their individual capacity, and in the other as an organized legal tribunal, it seems to me that the difficulty other as an organized legal tribunal, it seems to me that the difficulty is merely evaded, and not met by the suggestion, because it would be impossible for a judge to divest himself of the opinions and conclu-sions which he reached as an individual when acting as an umpire. Therefore I think that the proposition to refer the decision of this question to the judges of the Supreme Court, as provided for in the amendment suggested by the Senator from Indiana, would be improper.

My primary purpose and desire in this whole matter is to secure some tribunal by which this question shall be decided. I am unwill-

My primary purpose and desire in this whole matter is to secure some tribunal by which this question shall be decided. I am unwilling to leave it undecided, because it may possibly be a fruitful source of the greatest dangers to our institutions. If no legislation is had, if this act is not passed here or if it fails to be agreed upon by the other House, if from any cause whatever we should not consummate any legislation providing for the contingency which we all so much deprecate, I think no Senator present will deny that in the not distant future we may be confronted with a condition of things which will test in a degree beyond any to which this Constitution has ever here-tofore been subjected, its vitality and its strength. I think it is the part of the Congress of the United States, as wise legislators, to provide a remedy, to avoid and prevent this contingency, if it be possible to do so. Therefore I am prepared now, if I cannot get the legistion which I desire, to take what I regard as next best, and having the primary purpose of securing some proper tribunal for the decision of such a question as will probably arise in the count of the next presidential vote.

In providing these agencies, among all the conflicting propositions which have been submitted by different Senators, it does strike me, after due deliberation and consideration, that that presented by my colleague is more in accordance with the principles of the Constitution, more in accordance with the usages which have prevailed in other departments of the Government, and that the spirit of our Constitution is carried out more fully thereby than by any of the propositions which have been offered in competition. If it were a question to decide simply upon the election of a President, we all know that the Constitution provides that that shall be done by the House of Representatives, who come forward and stand here as the representatives of the popular vote. But the same Constitution requires that the Senate in such a contingency shall have the privilege of deciding who shall be the Vice-President of the United States. It is therefore clear that in a case like the one under consideration, when two conflicting returns come up claiming to be the return of a State, we have to decide not only who is President but who is Vice-President as well. That decision should accordingly be had by the joint voice of the House of Representatives, who extend as the exponents of the popular will, and of the Senate who represent the will of the States.

The objection urged by the distinguished Senator from Indiana that the vote by States would be repugnant to the very spirit of our institutions, because it would stifle the voice of the people in certain cases, cannot be regarded as valid if you compare it with the provisions of the Constitution and with the ideas which animated the framers of that instrument in the construction of the theory and machinery of our Government. This Government is not a democracy purely; is not a government of the people per se; but it is a representative government. It is a federal government. All the provisions of the Constitution, and especially and a fortiori this one providing for the election of a President when there should be no choice by the people, indicate a purpose and intent on the part of the framers of the Constitution to provide a tribunal other than that of the popular vote to decide who should perform the functions of President in the contingency therein contemplated. They provided that this vote should be taken by States. Therefore I say it is no violation of the spirit of the Constitution, but on the contrary it is in strict accordance with the provisions of that instrument, that in such a case as the one now under discussion, where two conflicting returns come up here and when the question is as to who shall be elected both President and Vice-President, both these bodies should exercise a voice in the matter, and the vote should be taken by States, inasmuch as it is provided that the vote for President shall be taken by States in the House of Representatives in the event of no election being had by the people. The proposition of my colleague is therefore, I assert, strictly in accordance with the spirit and letter of our Constitution, and for that reason to my mind it is preferable.

I assert, strictly in accordance with the spirit and letter of our Constitution, and for that reason to my mind it is preferable.

I do not hesitate to say, however, that if I cannot get my first choice, if I cannot secure the adoption of this amendment, I will take some other amendment, my primary purpose being, as I designated in my opening remarks, to secure by legislation some tribunal, some authority, to have the right to decide this question when the difficulty presents itself, rather than to leave it open to be decided and become the subject of future squabble, and perhaps much greater difficulty than squabble; because we all recognize, not only the possibility, but the certainty that if no legislation is had to provide for the difficulty that may arise, if, in the event it shall arise we are left with nothing but the constitutional provision, there will be no concert of action, no unity of opinion, as to the power in whom the right of decision shall then be vested.

Mr. MORTON. It seems that the purpose of these several amendments is to provide some way by which the vote of a State shall not in any contingency be lost. The second section of the bill provides that where there are two returns that return shall be counted which receives the vote of both Houses as the valid return. If the two Houses do not agree as to which is the valid return, then no vote from that State shall be counted. The amendment we are about to vote upon provides that in such a contingency, where the Houses disagree, the two Houses shall be together as one body, Senators and Representatives, each having one vote, and the vote shall then be taken by States. For example, the State of Delaware would have one Representative and two Senators, and they would cast the vote of that State, which would count one. New York would have thirty-three Representatives and two Senators, making thirty-five, and they, or a majority of them, would cast the vote of New York, counting one. Aside from the inequality and the anti-republican character of such an election, the gross injustice to the people, the absolute stifling of the public voice, there are other objections to it in the very line which this amendment is intended to meet. If the vote is to be taken by States and there should be thirty-eight States, as there will be next fall, and the States should be equally divided, then the question is lost. In that case the contingency would happen under which the vote of a State would be lost, because the last tribunal provided for deciding the question would have failed to agree. When you come to take the vote by States there would be very great danger that the votes of particular States would be lost in taking that vote, because if the delegation is equally divided then the vote of that State is not cast, according to this very amendment:

But if the representation of any State shall be equally divided, its vote shall not be counted.

This very amendment provides for not counting the vote of a State in deciding the question where the delegation is equally divided; and that is a contingency very likely to happen. It will not happen very often, I trust; it has only occurred once in the history of this nation that there were two returns of electors from the same State. We may hope that that contingency will never occur again; but it may. Then, if there should be such a contingency, it is not very reasonable to suppose that the two Houses will not be able to agree upon which is the true and valid return. Still that contingency may happen; but where the vote is to be taken by States the contingency of the delegation being equally divided and the vote of the State being lost in that way, in determining the question either in the election of a President by the vote of the States or in the decision of this question by the vote of the States, is likely to happen.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to suggest an amendment which I have prepared, in order that I may get his views upon it i

Mr. MORTON. I will give way to my friend in a moment when I get through with the point I am now making. I want to call the attention of the Senator proposing this amendment to a fact in our history, in the first election of a President by the House of Representatives in 1801. When that election took place, there were four-teen States in the Union. The delegations from two States were equally divided, and the votes of those States were not counted. From the very first ballot the delegations from Vermont and Maryland were evenly divided, and so those States were not counted; and that remained the case from the 11th of February until the 17th of February, and after thirty-five ballots had been taken the dead-lock in those two States was broken in this way: When they took the last ballot, after an hour's interval, on the thirty-sixth ballot, Mr. Morris, of Vermont, was absent, and the two Maryland Federalists, Craig and Baer, put in blank ballots, thus giving two more States to Jefferson, which, added to the eight which had always voted for him, made a majority. There were two States divided in the very first election by the House, a contingency likely to happen. So that, in endeavoring to meet this contingency of the two Houses being divided, the very plans resorted to are exceedingly liable to the same difficulty, Causing the loss of the vote of a State.

While I agree in the main with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Thur-MAN,] it seems to me that he has not been entirely logical. My friend from Texas [Mr. Maxey] made a very able and a very clearargument this morning, but I think the final conclusion was not in harmony with the premises with which he started out. He took the ground that the two Houses would be present in their separate capacity; the Senate there as a Senate, the House as a House; not merely the members of the two bodies. In that I think he was entirely right; and he took the ground that these two Houses were to count the vote. It is a duty then devolving upon the two Houses, and I understood the Senator to argue that it was not competent for these two Houses to cast the duty of counting the votes or determining any question upon the Supreme Court of the United States, because it belonged to the two Houses in their legislative capacity; but, if I understood my friend at the close of his remarks he came to the conclusion that we could authorize the President of the Senate to count the vote in case of disagreement between the two Houses. If we can authorize the President of the Senate to do it by virtue of this law, if we can depute to him the power, we can depute it to any other specific tribunal that

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator will permit me, I will state the posi-tion I took. The position which I assumed, as is very correctly stated by the Senator from Indiana, was that the two Houses appeared, organized in their separate capacities as a Senate and as a House, and over these organized bodies the President of the Senate presided; that under the Constitution you could not go outside of Congress to devolve the duty on anybody; that it was a personal trust. I further took the position that where these two Houses divided the vote of the Senate counted one, the vote of the House counted one, and the presiding officer being a part of Congress the duty of deciding the ques-tion where there was a divided vote between the two Houses could be devolved legitimately upon the President of the Senate, the presiding officer, and you could not go outside of the body to decide it.

Mr. MORTON. I understood that to be the argument of the Senator; but still I think the difficulty is not obviated. When the two Houses come together and the President of the Senate presides over both bodies for the time being, he has no casting vote under the Constitution. The Vice-President has the casting vote in the Senate on an equal division of that body, by virtue of the Constitution. The President of the Senate pro tempore has no casting vote under the Conresident of the Senate pro tempore has no casting vote under the Constitution, but he simply votes as a Senator. If you give the President pro tempore a casting vote where the two Houses fail to agree in determining which is the true vote of a State, that right thus conferred upon the President of the Senate is given to him by virtue of a law, and does not belong to him under the Constitution; so that after all we are deputing to an umpire or to a third party the exercise of a we are depitting to an uniplie of to a third party the exercise of a duty which, according to the argument of the Senator from Texas, and I think very clearly, too, belongs to the two Houses as a part of the legislative power of the country.

MI. MAXEY. That unpire is a part of our own body. He is not an outside body, but is a part of Congress.

Mr. MORTON. That may be true. He is a member of this body either as Vice-President or as a Senator; but the power conferred upon him is not given by the Constitution; it is a new power which we are conferring upon him. Our right to confer it does not depend upon the fact that he is a member of this body. If we have the power to confer this extraordinary function upon anybody, that power does not depend upon the fact that the person upon whom we confer it belongs to this body. We may confer it as well upon the Supreme Court as upon the President of the Senate.

The same argument applies in regard to my friend from Ohio, who was led into the same difficulty. He started out on the presumption that the two Houses must count the vote as a part of their legislative powers, but he ended by agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Johnston] that we might refer it to a joint convention of Senators and Representatives all voting together, the vote to be taken by States. If we can thus depute a legislative power to be exercised by a joint convention, a body unknown to the Constitution of the United States, and voting by States, a matter which the Constitution never contemplated, we can depute that power to the Supreme Court of the United States or to anybody else; so that I think my friend's conclusion was wrong. I deny the power to create an umpire to decide between the two Houses in a matter which is devolved upon the two Houses by the Constitution; but I said this, and I call the attention of my friend from Texas to it. He misapprehended my position a little. I say that, if we have the power to create an umpire or to call in a new tribunal, then I think the safest umpire, the one most satisfactory to the people of this nation, would be the Supreme Court of the United States, simply requiring that body to be in session when we come to count the votes; and in case of disagreement requiring it to decide it somewhere.

Mr. MAXEY. I think I understood the Senator's position, but, that he may understand mine, I referred to the page of the RECORD in which his view was given, and he will find by reference to it that this power was only to be exercised in a certain contingency, if tolerated at all.

Mr. MORTON. I failed to hear that part of my friend's remarks. Mr. MAXEY. I do not know but that I elaborated it. I referred to the page of the RECORD of Thursday last, which shows for itself, page 13.

Mr. MERRIMON. How would you give the Supreme Court juris-

Mr. MORTON. If we have power to give any outside tribunal jurisdiction we have power to give it to the Supreme Court, and that would be the most satisfactory tribunal to which we could refer so great a question. The people of this country would submit with more satisfaction to the decision of that body than they would to the decision of any one man, I care not how wise or how great he might be, or to any special tribunal that we might create.

In answer to the question put by my friend from North Carolina, I say we cannot confer the jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court as a Supreme Court. Still if we have the power to create a special tribunal we can confer it upon the judges of the Supreme Court because they are judges of that court.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask the Senator where we get the power to confer it upon any tribunal ?

Mr. MORTON. I have been trying to argue that we have not that power. I do not believe we have that power. I have said that if the unfortunate contingency should happen that the two Houses cannot agree which return shall be counted the vote of the State is lost; if it is left to the President of the Senate and he is not able to make up his mind which vote shall be counted, the vote is lost; or if you refer the whole matter to him and he comes to the conclusion that the certificate is defective where there is only one, the vote of the State is lost. The vote of the State may be lost in any contingency. In any way that you may dispose of this question, that is possible. You cannot devise any scheme under which the vote of a State may not possibly be lost. Under the very plan proposed by my friend from Virginia it is probable that the vote of a State would be lost. I have just shown that in the very first election made by the House two States were evenly divided and so remained for seven days until the thirty-sixth ballot was taken, and then the dead-lock was broken by one member dodging and two members from other States casting blank ballots.

Mr. RANDÖLPH. May I interrupt the Senator from Indiana for a moment?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.
Mr. RANDOLPH. The Senator from Indiana says that, under any tribunal that may be adopted or that has been suggested, it is possible to lose the vote of a State. I think if he will refer to the plan I suggested yesterday he will find that it would be impossible to lose the vote of any State. I made the argument yesterday; I do not know whether the Senator was present at the time or not. My proposition was this: That the two Houses should vote separately; that in the event of their not being able to agree as to which the true returns of a State were, and in that event only, the President of the Senate of a State were, and in that event only, the President of the Senate should declare which the true returns were; but that declaration should be based upon aggregating the votes of the two Houses, and a majority in that aggregation should determine the result. I would like to know from the Senator from Indiana whether that does not preclude the possibility of rejecting the vote of a State?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I rise for the purpose of making a motion to go into executive session. We cannot get through with this subject to-day, and it may as well be disposed of hereafter. Does the Senator from Indiana The PRESIDENT pro tempore.

yield for that purpose?

Mr. MORTON. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the motion, the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] desires to present an amendment.

Mr. MORTON. Let it be read for information. I desire to hear it.

Mr. MAXEY. I move to insert at the end of section 2 the follow-

But, if the two Houses fail to agree as to which of the returns shall be counted, then the President of the Senate, as presiding officer of the two Houses, shall decide which is the true and valid return; and the same shall then be counted.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask leave to submit an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, and which I ask to have read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported. The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert after the word "which" in section 2, line 7, the words:

Shall be duly authenticated by the State authorities, recognized by and in harmony with the United States, as provided by the Constitution.

So that, if amended, that portion of the section will read:

And that return from such State shall be counted which shall be duly authenticated by the State authorities, recognized by and in harmony with the United States, as provided by the Constitution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina proposes to offer this amendment when it shall be in order.

Mr. MERRIMON. As I wish to submit some remarks upon it, I ask that the amendment be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 21, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read, corrected, and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

NEZ PERCÉ INDIAN AGENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of the order of May 12, 1875, relday to day, as we think we can dispose of it in one day.

ative to the protection of the Nez Percé Indian agent in the possession of his agency; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

WATER LOTS ON EAST BANK OF THE POTOMAC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the Chief of Engineers on the privileges on water lots on the east bank of the Potomac River; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

DR. D. M. ALLEN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting copies of the papers in the case of Dr. D. M. Allen, arrested in 1862 and held at Camp Chase upon a charge of disloyalty; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

FORTIFICATIONS ON GALVESTON ISLAND, TEXAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the Chief of Engineers on House bill No. 2089, to provide for the erection of military fortifications on Galveston Island, Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DISPOSITION OF INDIAN FUNDS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draught of a bill authorizing him as trustee of various Indian tribes to deposit certain funds in the Treasury of the United States in lieu of their investment; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

EMPLOYÉS OF INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with section 194 of the Revised Statutes, the names of clerks and others employed in his Department or in any of its Bureaus during the year 1875, the time they were employed, and the sums paid to each; which was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BRIGHT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department be instructed to inquire into the management and disposition of captured and abandoned property; and that said committee be increased to nine members, be authorized to send for persons and papers, and report to this House by bill or other-

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. TERRY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the annual report of the board of managers of the National Home for disabled volunteer soldiers for 1875, and moved that it be printed and recommitted; which motion was agreed to.

YOSEMITE TURNPIKE-ROAD COMPANY.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2797) granting to the Yosemite Turnpike-Road Company right of way through the public lands for a wagon-road; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered

WASHINGTON, CINCINNATI AND SAINT LOUIS RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a substitute (H. R. No. 2798) for the bill (H. R. No. 181) to authorize the Washington, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railroad Company to construct a narrow-gauge railway from tide-water to the cities of Saint Louis and Chicago, with amendments; which were ordered to be printed and recommitted.

THE POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS.

Mr. VAN VORHES, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 160) to make certain payments to the Pottawatomic Indians, with a report in writing; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill and report recommitted.

REGULATION OF STEAM-VESSELS, ETC.

Mr. REAGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report back a bill (H. R. No. 1190) to amend certain sections of titles 48 and 52, regulation of commerce and navigation and regulation of steam-vessels, Revised Statutes of the United States, pages 800 and 857, with a substitute, and to move that the substitute (H. R. No.

2799) be printed and recommitted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. REAGAN. I now ask that the consideration of the substitute be set for Tuesday of next week and from day to day until disposed of. Mr. HURLBUT. I do not object, if it is not to interfere with the appropriation bills.

Mr. REAGAN. We do not ask that it shall interfere with appropriation bills

The SPEAKER. That is understood.

Mr. FRYE. There has been an assignment of an important bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary for Wednesday of next week, and this should not interfere with an assignment already made.

The SPEAKER. With that modification the gentleman's motion will be considered as agreed to; that is, that it shall be the special order only for next Tuesday

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SCHOONER BERGEN.

Mr. TEESE, by unanimous consent, introduced joint resolution (H. R. No. 88) referring to the Court of Claims the claim against the United States for the loss of the schooner Bergen; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM WATTS.

Mr. EDEN, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, moved that committee be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 2361) to refund to William Watts, of the county of Boone, and State of Kentucky, the sum of $5,610 illegally taken from him and paid into the Treasury of the United States by the collector of internal revenue for the sixth district of Kentucky in excess of the amount of lawful tax collected upon the sale of 28,031 pounds of tobacco on the 28th of June, 1864, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims; which motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HURLBUT. I hope we will now have the regular order of business. There are important reports waiting.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at fifteen minutes to one o'clock, and the regular order of business is the call of committees for reports of a public nature, the call resting with the Committee on the Judiciary.

TRANSFER OF CAUSES IN ALABAMA.

Mr. HURD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1439) authorizing the transfer of certain causes from the circuit court of the United States for the district of Alabama at Mobile into the circuit court of the United States for the middle and northern districts of Alabama at Montgomery and Huntsville, in said State, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that all civil causes, actions, which was read, provides that all civil causes, actions, suits, executions, pleas, process, or other proceedings whatsoever, which were transferred by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1873, from the district courts of the United States for the northern and middle districts of Alabama into the circuit court of the United States for the district of Alabama at Mobile, Alabama, and which are now pending in said circuit court, be, and the same are hereby, transferred from said circuit court at Mobile into the circuit courts of the United States for said northern and middle districts, respectively; and the circuit courts of the United States in and for said districts shall have jurisdiction to try and determine all such causes and actions so transferred the same as if such causes or actions had been originally brought in such circuit court; and the clerk of said circuit court at Mobile shall transmit all of the original papers in such causes, together with a complete transcript of all dockets, minutes, judg-ments, orders, and decrees, in such of said causes as are not finally disposed of in said circuit court at Mobile, to the circuit courts for said northern and middle districts, respectively, to each the causes, &c., as were originally transferred from the district courts of said

Mr. HURD. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr.

CALDWELL.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I apprehend that it is only necessary to state the object sought to be accomplished by this bill to commend it to the favorable consideration of the House. By turning to the act of March 3, 1873, it will be found that the circuitcourt powers which had previously vested in the district court for the middle and northern district of Alabama were taken away from those districts, and that the suits and causes then pending in those district courts were transferred to the circuit court at Mobile, Alabama. By act of June 22, 1875, there were two additional circuits established in Alabama, one at Montgomery and one at Huntsville, presided over by the same judge who held the circuit court at Mobile. All the causes in the district courts having been transferred to Mobile, the papers are there still. The object of this bill is to transfer those causes to the circuit courts in the two districts indicated. There is no objection to the bill and there can be none, and I trust the House will pass it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPROVAL OF BILLS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. LYNDE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1970) relating to the approval of bills in the Territory of Arizona.

The bill was read. It provides that every bill which shall have passed the legislative council and house of representatives of the Territory of Arizona shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the governor of the Territory; if he approve it, he shall sign it, but if he do not approve it, he shall return it, with his objections, to the house in which it originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their journal and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that house shall pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that house it shall become a law, the governor's objection to the contrary notwithstanding; but in such case the votes of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays and be entered upon the journal of each house respectively. And if the governor shall not return any bill presented to him for approval, after its passage by both houses of the Legislative Assembly, within three days (Sundays excepted) after such presentation, the same shall become a law in like manner as if the governor had approved it; provided, however, that the assembly shall not have adjourned sine die during the three days prescribed as above, in which case it shall not become a law.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHAPTER 137 OF ACTS OF 1875.

Mr. LYNDE also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2324) back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2324) to amend section 3 of chapter 137 of the acts of the year 1875. *

The bill was read. It provides that section 3 of chapter 137 of the acts of the year 1875 be amended by striking out, at the end of the section, the words "and the trial of issues of fact in the circuit courts shall in all suits, except those of equity and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, be by jury."

In its second section it provides that issues of fact in civil cases in any circuit court may be tried and determined by the court without the intervention of a jury, whenever the parties, or their attorneys of record, file with the clerk a stipulation in writing waiving a jury. The finding of the court upon the facts, which may be either general or special, shall have the same effect as the verdict of a jury.

Mr. LYNDE. It was formerly the law in the United States courts, as well as the law in most of the State courts, that where the parties were willing and agreed that a cause should be tried by the court were willing and agreed that a cause should be tried by the court they might waive the jury. At the time of the revision of the laws of the United States the law was changed and it is required that the trial of all issues of facts in all suits shall be by jury, and the courts have construed the law as meaning that they have no jurisdiction and no right to try a case, even where the parties consent. That has been found very inconvenient, and this bill is recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary as an amendment to the Revised Statutes. Statutes

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

SPEECHES IN CONGRESS.

Mr. LYNDE also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1197) providing for the printing of speeches and remarks of members of Congress and of United States Senators in the language in which they are delivered; and the same was laid on the table.

CLERK OF GREENVILLE DISTRICT COURT, SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. ASHE, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2256) to provide for filling the office of clerk of the district court of the United States at Greenville, South Carolina.

The bill was read. It authorizes and empowers the clerk of the circuit court of the United States for the State of South Carolina to perform the duties and receive the emoluments appertaining to the office of clerk of the district court of the United States at Greenville, in said State, which has circuit jurisdiction.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ASHE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO ELECTION FUNDS.

Mr. CAULFIELD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 876) making it a misdemeanor for any person in the employ of the United States to demand or contribute election-funds.

The bill provides that, from and after the passage of the act, it shall not be lawful for any person or persons in the employment of the United States to demand from any other person so employed any money or other valuables to be used as an election-fund or to de fray the expenses of an election in any State, county, or national election in the United States.

The bill in its second section provides that it shall not be lawful for any person or persons employed in the service of the United States, in any manner whatever, to contribute any money or other valuable thing to be used as an election-fund or to aid in the expenses of any election or canvass for an election in any State, county, or district in the United States.

The bill in its third section provides that any person violating the provisions of either of the preceding sections shall, upon conviction, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding $1,000 and imprisoned not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the

The bill in its fourth section provides that the judges of the district and circuit courts shall give this act in charge to grand juries.

The amendment reported by the committee was as follows:

In section 1, line 5, after the word "demand," insert the words "or solicit;" so that it will read: "it shall not be lawful for any person or persons in the employment of the United States to demand or solicit from any other person so employed," &c.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BROWN.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. I was authorized by the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service to report a bill on this subject when that committee should be called, and I now desire to offer it as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill just reported.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD]

yield for that purpose?

Mr. CAULFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky that he may offer his substitute.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to offer a section as a substitute for the first section of the bill, so as to perfect the original bill before the substitute is voted on.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I call for the reading first of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert as follows:

SECTION 1. That no officer or employé of the Government shall require or request, give to or receive from, any other officer or employé of the same or other person, directly or indirectly, any money, property, or other thing of value, for political purposes; and any such officer or employé who shall offend against the provisions of the act shall at once be dismissed from the service of the United States, and also be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof fined not less than five hundred nor more than three thousand dollars, and imprisoned not more than one year, at the discretion of the judge trying the case.

SEC. 2. That the district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of the offenses created by this act.

SEC. 3. That the judges of the district and circuit courts shall give this act in charge to the grand juries.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the substitute for the first section sent to the desk by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN. 7

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 1. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any officer of the United States, postmaster, clerk, or employé of the same, to give, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value to any person or persons or political party or other organization or association, for the purpose or with the intent to assist or forward the interests of any person or persons or political organization or party in any election for any officer of the United States or of any State. And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to solicit, ask, receive, or accept any gift or donation of any money or other valuable thing for the purpose or with the intent that the same shall be used to assist in or influence the election of any officer.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield for that amendment?

Mr. CAULFIELD. I cannot yield for that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Then the amendment is not before the House.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to offer an amendment to come in as a proviso at the end of the second section.

Mr. REAGAN. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAUL-FIELD] to consider that neither in the original bill nor in the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Brown] is the provision of the latter part of my amendment included.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not before the House. Mr. REAGAN. How is it that amendments cannot be offered to the bill ?

The SPEAKER. Because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAUL-FIELD ] has the floor and is entitled to hold it for one hour under the

Mr. REAGAN. I give notice then that I will offer the amendment after the hour is out.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. Hoar, as follows:

Provided, Nothing herein shall be construed to prevent voluntary contributions for the purpose of circulating documents or procuring public addresses for the purpose of giving information on questions of public interest.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield for that amendment ?

Mr. CAULFIELD. At the present stage of the proceedings I cannot yield for that amendment. I have simply to say that as far as the bill which I have reported by order of the committee and the bill which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Brown] has offered as a substitute are concerned, I see but little difference between the two bills, except that probably the bill offered by the gentleman from Kentucky is somewhat more comprehensive than the one reported by the committee. As between the two bills, I would certainly have no objection to either, but I stand of course by the report of the committee.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman will see that neither the bill nor the substitute makes it an offense to solicit or receive money, and the men who solicit and receive money are generally worse than the men who give it. I hope he will accept the amendment I have offered.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. I think the gentleman will see that my substitute covers that point.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I will state to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that I have read the bills carefully, and I am satisfied that the substitute makes the very provision that the gentleman is anxious the substitute makes the very provision that the gentleman is anxious to make by his amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] to allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. CAULFIELD. It may be read for information.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow my amendment to be before the House?

Mr. CAULFIELD. I will allow the amendment of the gentleman.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I will allow the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be read for information.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair understands that the gentleman from Illinois does yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND 1

Mr. CAULFIELD. That his amendment may be read for informa-

The SPEAKER. That was not the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Then I yield for no purpose.

The SPEAKER. Is it then an amendment pending before the House or not? The gentleman should say yes or no.

Mr. McCRARY. I wish to make an appeal to my colleague from Illinois, on the committee. He knows that the minority desire to propose the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I think on reflection he will conclude to allow a vote to be taken on that amendment.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I was not aware of the fact the gentleman states, and under this circumstance I yield to allow the amendment to be offered.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will allow my amendment to be read for information.

Mr. CAULFIELD. O! It may be read for information.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. Townsend, of Pennsylvania, as follows:

Provided, however, That any expenditure for election purposes allowed by the constitution or laws of any State shall not be construed as being within the provisions of this act.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Now I ask the gentleman to allow that amendment to be before the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for the purpose of offering that amendment?

Mr. CAULFIELD. I cannot yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will allow me to explain that the constitution and laws of the State of Pennsyl-vania allow certain expenses for electioneering purposes, and I ask him to except these from the provisions of his bill

Mr. BLAINE. Such as? Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. They are allowed for the distribution of information.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee,

[Mr. Dibrell,] who introduced the bill.

Mr. Dibrell,] who introduced the bill.

Mr. Dibrell. I have carefully read the bill supported by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Brown,] and I believe it is more comprehensive than the one I introduced. I am willing therefore to accept it, and hope the House will pass it.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I now move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman does that I ask him if he will not allow my amendment to be offered to the House

Mr. HOAR. Before the previous question is sustained I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Brown]—I have not seen his bill in print—if he will consider my amendment as pending as a proviso to his substitute as well as to the original bill. If his bill should be substituted even after the House had adopted my amendment it would fall to the ground if it were only to the original bill. I do not ask him to accept it, but to allow it to be pending as an amendment to his substitute.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. As I understand it, I will not now object.

Mr. HOAR. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask that it be considered as an amendment pending to both the bill and the substitute.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. Before making that arrangement with the gentleman from Massachusetts, I would like to hear his amend-the gentleman from Massachusetts, I would like to hear his amendment again reported.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Brown] to the fact that his bill only provides penalties against officers and employés of the Federal Government. It does not provide a remedy against any one else; it fails in a most important feature to meet the necessities of the case.

The Clark again med the bill provided from the

The Clerk again read the bill reported from the committee with the amendments recommended by the committee, the substitute moved by Mr. Brown, of Kentucky, and the amendment proposed by Mr. HOAR.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOAR. Before the House proceeds to vote, I suppose my friend from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] intends to avail himself of his right to close the debate after the previous question has been ordered. I would like to say a few words in support of the amendment which I have

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAUL-FIELD] yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hoar?]
Mr. CAULFIELD. I insist upon the previous question.

Mr. HOAR. I do not ask the gentleman to withdraw the previous lestion. This is a bill reported from the committee, and the gentleman reporting it has the right, if he chooses to avail himself of it, to an hour to close the debate upon the bill, after the previous question has been ordered. I ask him to yield for a few minutes, that I may, as a member of this committee, briefly explain my purpose in moving the amendment I have offered.

Mr. CAULFIELD. This amendment of the gentleman was spoken of in the committee, and I am willing to yield to him for five minutes

Mr. HOAR. It may take ten minutes; I will try to explain in five minutes. This is a very important bill and involves very important constitutional principles. It proposes to put a stop to the abuse of collecting money, by such moral intimidation as may well exist in such cases, from persons in the employ of the Government, to be used for political purposes. It is one of those measures which come naturally from the party in opposition to the Administration. There are many abuses which grow up in the political administration of this country, which the party in opposition to the Administration are likely to feel, are likely to perceive, and are more likely than their opponents to endeavor to eradicate. And no factious opposition should be offered to such reform.

The practice of using money corruptly to affect popular elections in this country is one of the most dangerous practices to our liberties. Where it prevails it poisons the waters of civil liberty in the fountain. I, for one, had rather be governed by a monarch or an order of nobility than be governed by a bribed majority in a popular vote. And the practice wherever it grows up ought to be burned out as with a red-hot iron, no matter what party may have profited by it in the past or what party may hope to profit by it in the future.

There is but one thing more wicked, there is but one thing more dangerous. The corruption of voters where all the citizens, all the people, can vote is in its nature limited by the expense which would be required to corrupt them on a large scale. A fraud in the count by the officers having charge of an election is a worse and a graver danger and a greater crime. But this crime is great enough, wherever it exists or wherever it is threatened, to demand the serious attention of the law-making power.

But in this attempt to correct this abuse, if it exists, or to prevent it if it be threatened, we must be careful not to invade the constitutional rights of any class of our citizens. I believe that those of our fellow-citizens who hold public office are not and should not be excluded from the exercise of their constitutional rights as American citizens. They should not be set apart as a class of pariahs or Brahmins, without political interests, without the right to exercise their fair share in the government of the state, and without the interests and the privileges which belong to the rest of us. I think it is the privilege of every American citizen to contribute voluntarily and without coercion or solicitation to two things, to the circulation of public documents, speeches, and essays on political questions, and to the aiding of public addresses made by persons who can instruct the people in that way. I think it comes within, if not the letter, certainly the spirit of that amendment to the Constitution of the United States which the State of Virginia proposed immediately upon its inception; that is, that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. It is an abridgment of the freedom of the press to deny to any American citizen the right to present to any other American citizen any printed matter of a public nature which he conceives may aid him in the discharge of his political du-

I am willing to support this bill, stringent and severe as it is, pro-hibiting any officer of the Government from contributing, or any officer of the Government from soliciting of his fellow-officer a contribu-tion to political funds; but I desire to have this proviso inserted in the bill, that we shall not prevent the voluntary contribution by the office-holder for the mere purpose of circulating documents or of providing for public addresses. Without that it seems to me that this viding for public addresses. bill would trench upon the spirit and upon the letter of the second article of the amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. CAULFIELD. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in what he has said about the amendment which he has offered, I have simply to say that it was the object of the member intro-ducing this bill, it was the object of the committee that reported it, to cut off all apologies and excuses of every kind and nature for perpetrating off all apologies and excuses of every kind and nature for perpetrating fraud in all elections and advancing the interests of any party, on the part of those who are employed by the Government. We felt that those officers who are in the employ of the Government should contribute their time exclusively to the Government that employs and pays them for their services. If the amendment is allowed it will only afford a cloak for contributions to election funds such as have heretofore existed. We wish to cut off all apologies, all excuses of every laboratory which may add to the every kind, all subterfuges of every character which may add to the means of carrying on elections by contributions of funds on the part of those employed by the Government.

The bill as offered prohibits any officer in the employ of the Government not only from soliciting but also from contributing; it prohibits all kinds of contributions upon the part of every class of officials in the employ of the Government. We are opposed to the whole thing. We wish to establish a new rule; we desire that no vestige of the old custom shall remain.

The bill does not prohibit persons in private life, persons not in the employ of the Government, from contributing for such purposes as the gentleman indicates; but it will forbid every Government official, from the highest to the lowest, to contribute to the election fund in any possible shape. We believe the measure is right; it seeks to remedy a great evil; and we must therefore insist on its passage as reported.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question? Is the language of the bill such as to include within its provisions Senators and Representatives in Congress?

Mr. CAULFIELD. I do not so consider.

Mr. BLAINE. It seems to me that is a very important point to be

Mr. CAULFIELD. I do not consider that the bill includes Senators and Representatives, for the reason that they are not, properly speaking, officers of the Government.

Mr. BLAINE. Why not include them?

Mr. CAULFIELD. If the gentleman wishes to include them, he may offer an amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. I will certainly do so if the gentleman will permit me, because my observation has been, and I think the testimony of the country will be, that larger "corruption funds" have been contributed in campaigns for Congress, both by successful and defeated candidates, than have been contributed for a generation by all the Government clerks aimed at in the bill. If you attempt now to cut off the five and ten dollar contributions, which certainly ought to be saved to the poor clerks from whom they may be taken, while you allow a member of Congress, or a candidate for Congress, to contribute $5,000, or $10,000, or $20,000—which I have heard of being done—it seems to me your bill is a mere pretense, and does not strike at all at the chief feature of the existing evil.

The gentleman permits me, and I move to amend by inserting "Senators and Representatives in Congress."

Mr. CAULFIELD. I hold the floor. I refuse to yield further.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield for this amendment.

Mr. CAULFIELD. No, sir; I will not yield for any amendment;

and I will give very good reasons for not yielding.

Mr. BLAINE. But the gentleman yields for this.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I will not.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman said he would yield.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Very well; I withdraw the assent; I will not yield.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the gentleman declines to have Senators and Representatives brought under the same rule that he wants to apply to Government clerks.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Mr. Speaker, there are other members of the Judiciary Committee, I understand, who have reports to offer. I do not know when our committee will again be called; and I wish to give those gentlemen an opportunity to report. But, in reply to the gentleman from Maine, I must say that, whatever his experience may have been in regard to contributions upon the part of members of Congress and frauds committed by them, I know nothing about them. He may speak from experience; I have no experience upon that subject.

Mr. BLAINE. I have run seven times for Congress; and I never Mr. BLAINE. I have run seven times for Congress; and I never contributed so much as a postage-stamp for any improper purpose in securing my election; but I could indicate gentlemen who, if rumor is to be trusted, have spent very large sums in political campaigns. I do not refer to any member of the present Congress.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I insist upon the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. Before the gentleman does that

Mr. CAULFIELD. I can yield no longer.

Mr. BLAINE. I rise to a privileged motion. I wish to have a test made upon this question; and I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered. It will be for the House to say on yeas and nays whether it will include Representatives and Senators

A MEMBER. And candidates.

Mr. BLAINE. No, we cannot do that, because it is too indefinite.

But Representatives and Senators in Congress ought to be included. For that express purpose, I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and on that motion I call for the yeas and navs

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be no objection to that course.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] did

Mr. CAULFIELD. I insist upon the previous question.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. Blaine] moves to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.
Mr. CAULFIELD. I did not yield for that purpose.
The SPEAKER. It is a privileged motion.
Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will yield.

I think the amendment is eminently proper.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is not in order. The question being taken on the motion to reconsider, the Speaker declared that the "ayes" appeared to prevail.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I call for a division. Mr. CAULFIELD. I can for a division.
Mr. BLAINE. Let us have the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered.
Mr. CAULFIELD. I am willing to yield—
Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The question was taken; and there were-yeas 205, nays 4, not voting 80; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSE stated that his colleague, Mr. Young, was detained from the House by illness.

Mr. HUNTER stated that his colleague, Mr. Kason, was absent on account of sickness

Mr. BASS stated that Mr. Danford, who was sick in bed, requested him to announce that was also the reason for his absence yesterday.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY stated that his colleague, Mr. DAVY, was absent by leave of the House.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. NEW. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Cox in the chair.) The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAINE. I rise to a question of order. I wish to understand from the Chair when this question comes up in reference to which we have just voted on a motion to reconsider who will be entitled to

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is time enough to decide that question when it arises. Whether the gentleman from Maine is entitled to the floor depends upon whether he is recognized by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has decided according to uniform usage. Mr. BLAINE. Mr. BLAINE. That uniform usage gives me the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has so decided.
Mr. NEW. I wish first to inquire whether the morning hour has

Mr. NEW. I wish first to inquire whether the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has; and the gentleman from Indiana has the floor on a question of privilege.

Mr. NEW. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. GLOVER.] the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SMITH.] and myself, three of the members on the real-estate pool special committee, were subpœnaed to appear to-day at eleven o'clock before the grand jury of this District. Inasmuch as it seems to be well settled the privilege of a member is the privilege of the House, and that privilege cannot be waived except with the consent of the House, we have thought it to be our duty to submit this matter to the House for its direction. It may not be, however, improper for me to say we are entirely willing, with the permission of the House, to obey the process that has been served upon us. process that has been served upon us.

Mr. HOLMAN. Unless some gentleman desires to submit a proposition based on this announcement, I shall move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. TUCKER. I wish to introduce a resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield for that purpose.
Mr. TUCKER. In view of what my friend from Indiana, [Mr. NEW, ] mentioned to me this morning, I offer the following resolution. The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas John M. Glover, Jeptha D. New, and A. Herr Smith, members of this House and of the committee of this House for investigating the affairs of the real-estate pool of the District of Columbia, have been summoned to appear as witnesses before the grand jury of the district court for said District to testify; and whereas this House sees no reason why the said members should not appear and testify: Therefore, said summons.

*Resolved**, That they be, and are hereby, authorized to appear and testify under the said summons.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire of the gentleman who offered that resolution why it enumerates the committee these gentlemen are on? I suggest whether, as this is in reference to a privilege of a member of the House and not of any member of a committee, it should not be stricken out.

Mr. TUCKER. I do not think there is any necessity for it. If the gentleman will read the resolution he will see it is not because they are members of the committee, but because they are members of this House. It is a question of privilege in reference to them as members of the House.

Mr. HOAR. If I understand the resolution, it recites that the gentlemen who are summoned to appear are members of a particular committee of the House.

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, it does do that.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand what that has to do with the resolution.

Mr. TUCKER. I will mention simply as indicating, although the summons did not do that, the character of the inquiry as to which they were to testify before the grand jury.

Mr. HOAR. How can the gentleman know that? I do not see how the House can know what questions will be asked before the grand

Mr. TUCKER. I do not think there can be any objection to it in this form.

Mr. HOAR. What has become of the privilege asserted the other day in the case of the other members?

Mr. TUCKER. I do not know that all questions of privilege are

Mr. TUCKER. I do not know that all questions of privilege are in my custody, and I cannot answer it.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think anybody else can.

Mr. TUCKER. I offered, as the gentleman from Massachusetts knows, a paper on that subject, which has not been reported as yet from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew my motion.
Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman] yield to me? I will not detain the House for a moment. I merely wish to have my amendment read and ordered to be printed.
Mr. HOLMAN. I do not yield.
Mr. BLAINE. I merely ask the gentleman to yield to have the amendment printed; that is all.
Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to its being printed. I do not yield to have it read.

yield to have it read.

Mr. BLAINE. I merely desire to have it printed in the RECORD.

It is only a few lines.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield to have the amendment of the gentleman from Maine read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2, line 2, by inserting after the words "United States" the follow-

Ament section 2, the 2, by inserting after the words. United States the following words:

Or any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress.

And at the close of section add:

And the contribution of money or other valuable thing as herein prohibited by any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress, while he was a candidate for such position, shall, in addition to the penalties herein prescribed, operate as a disqualification to his holding his seat.

Mr. BLAINE. I shall offer that amendment when the bill comes up to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. Cox.) Does the gentleman desire to have the amendment printed in the RECORD only or does he desire to have it printed otherwise?

Mr. BLAINE. Only in the RECORD.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield now to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] for the same purpose.

Mr. REAGAN. I send to the desk an amendment which I desire to have read and to be printed in the RECORD. I will offer it as an amendment when the bill is again under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1 of the substitute by striking out of the first line of said section the words "of the Gevernment," and by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Or other person, intending thereby to corruptly influence the election of any Senator or Representative in Congress or the election or appointment of any other officer of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] for another amendment which he desires to have printed.
Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I propose to offer as a substitute for the pending bil, when I have the opportunity, the amendment which I send to the desk. I desire now to have it printed in the RECORD. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 1. That it shall be unlawful for any person to solicit of any officer or employed the Government of the United States any contribution of money or other thing of value with intent to aid in securing the election of any person to any State or Federal office whatever.

Sec. 2. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for any officer of the United States, postmaster, clerk, or employé of the same to give, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value to any political organization or person with intent to assist or forward the interest of any political party or the election of any particular person or persons to any office, State or Federal.

Sec. 3. That any person violating the provisions of the foregoing sections of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction before a court of competent jurisdiction, shall be fined not less than $1,000 and imprisoned for a period not less than six months, and shall be removed from office upon such conviction being certified by the clerk of the court before which such conviction was had to the appointing power. the appointing power.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. FRYE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2800) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay judgments provided for in an act approved February 15, 1875, entitled "An act providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11, chapter 459, of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and, with an accompanying statement, ordered to be

TEXAN BORDER TROUBLES. Mr. SCHLEICHER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Texan Border Troubles, reported the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Texas Border Troubles shall be authorized to have a map of the Lower Rio Grande engraved and printed to accompany their report and evidence.

ORDERS TO PRINT.

On motion of Mr. CAULFIELD, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 876) making it a misdemeanor for any person in the employ of the United States to demand or contribute election funds and the substitute therefor offered by Mr. Brown, of Kentucky, were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. WALLACE, of South Carolina, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 2255) for the relief of mail contractors for services rendered in certain States prior to May 31, 1861, was ordered to be reprinted.

LONDON AGENTS OF NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BEEBE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to report to this House, at the earliest practicable date, a statement of the accounts of the Navy Department with the fiscal agents of that Department at London for each year from 1868 to date, giving the names of such fiscal agents, and showing the monthly balances of said accounts.

MOVEMENT OF TROOPS IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. AINSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to offer for present consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House whether troops have been ordered from Fort Union to Colfax County, New Mexico; and, if so, why they were so ordered.

Mr. FORT. I object to the present consideration of that resolu-tion. Let it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Mr. AINSWORTH. Very well.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now insist on my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] is entitled to the description.

titled to the floor.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. Hubbell.]

Mr. Hubbell. Mr. Chairman, the experience of ages has confirmed the fact that the natural tendency of the human race is to arrange itself into nationalities, each under a separate and distinct

The first object of each of these separate organizations is to protect its subjects in their lives, property, and rights, and to encourage by every legitimate means the development of their material interests.

A judicious system of political economy, under which the wealth and prosperity of a nation may be advanced, commands in every country the best efforts of its ablest statesmen; and under each well-organized government laws are made and put in force mainly with the view of advancing the interests of its own people without regard to the interests of other communities or powers beyond a due respect.

tion and advancement. Even David A. Wells, in his report to the Secretary of the United States Treasury for 1868, page 23, says:

A careful study of the financial systems of the various commercial nations of Europe has led the commissioner unhesitatingly to the conclusion that, whatever may be the state of European public opinion in respect to free trade and whatever may be the claims professed for it on the broad grounds of liberality and humanitarianism, the fiscal legislation of Great Britain, France, Germany, Belgium, Holland, Austria, and Russia is now, and always has been, framed solely and exclusively with reference to one object, namely, the promotion of supposed national self-interest, and has never had the slightest regard to the interest of any other nation, or to any arguments other than those based upon specific national wants and national servicences.

Joseph Wharton, in his admirable brochure on national self-protection, justly claims that "the nation exists of itself and for itself, not by the grace or for the benefit of any beyond its boundaries;" and he logically adds that-

It cannot be seriously disputed that this exclusive property of each nation in itself, this assiduous caring by each for its own special weal, and this watchful, semi-antagonistic attitude of each toward its neighbors have the same beneficial effect upon each that comes to individuals from each person being perfectly convinced that his fate depends upon his own exertion of his faculties, that his task is to till his own field and mind his own family and business, being well-assured that he and his, and not others, shall reap the harvest and enjoy the fruits of diligence and thrift.

All nations may not adopt the same methods of carrying out this principle. In fact, no system of political economy ever has or can be devised that will be found to admit of universal application. As nations differ in the extent of their geographical boundaries, in the varieties and qualities of their soils, in the temperature and changes climate, in the diversity and extent of their mineral treasures, so will the people adapt themselves to their circumstances, without special reference to any defined or fixed system of political economy known in theory or practice.

Under these varying circumstances it has ever been the mission of enlightened statesmanship to discriminate and legislate with a strict regard to circumstances and with the view of securing the largest degree of prosperity to all classes within the commonwealth without degree of prosperity to all classes within the commonwealth without reference to the policy or practice of other governments.

In all countries, in modern times, the revenues gathered into the national treasury are obtained mainly from the receipts accruing from a customs tariff. The grandeur of the Utopian theory of universal free trade has never yet been realized, and all modern policies go to show that in national practice the world is receding from this promised realization of the Cobden club and the free-trade fraternity generally.

In the United States, from the foundation of the Government down to this centennial year, the policy of our statesmen has been, under the approval and support of a large majority of the people, in favor of a tariff not only for revenue but also for protection to the diversified interests of the whole country. It is true this system has its opponents, and at certain periods in our history they have for a time controlled and shaped tariff legislation in accordance with their own views, but in every case, as experience proved, with injurious and in many instances with disastrous results.

The protective policy is no visionary theory. That experienced statesman M. Thiers, in one of his best speeches before the Corps Législatif in 1870, on the advantages of protection to native industries, said: "Those who speak of universal, unrestricted competition, do not comprehend it. Do you know what true competition is? It is that no nation should ever suffer itself to make any surrender of its native industries. It is that no one should say that it will no longer manufacture cotton, because it cannot produce as cheaply as another; that it will no longer fabricate cloths, because it cannot fabricate at so good an account as its neighbor; that it will not raise grain, under the pretext that grain is produced more dearly than in other countries. The nation that should reason thus would exhibit the reasoning of an idiot. Do you know what is the true competition of nation with nation, the universal competition? It is a noble ambition on the part of each people; the noble emulation of producing everything, and even that which it produces with less advantage than other people. This competition has, as its result, the reduction of prices to the lowest attainable standard throughout the entire world."

So also Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke, the English statesman, in his "Greater Britain," says: "Those who speak of the selfishness of the protectionists, as a whole, can never have taken the trouble to examine into the arguments by which protection is supported in Australia and America. In these countries protection is no mere national delusion; it is a system deliberately adopted, with open eyes, as one conducive to the country's welfare." And again: "If every State consults the good of its own citizens, we shall, by the action of all nations, obtain the desired happiness of the whole world, and this with rapidity."

Under the administration of the republican party the necessities of the Government, growing out of the expenses of the war, compelled Congress to largely increase the rates of duty on imported goods. In framing the customs tariffs from year to year the double purpose was always kept in view of so arranging the scale of duties as to afford, first, a sufficient revenue to meet the demands upon the Treasury; and, secondly, to extend protection to such of our existing industries as were most affected by excessive importations of similar goods from European and other countries, as well as to call into existence other industries not then attempted.

to the interests of other communities or powers beyond a due respect for the regulations of international law.

It is not too much to say, after a practical test of fourteen years, that this policy of guarding and fostering our own home industries but it is and must ever be the fundamental basis of national legislatories all over the country, in the rapid development of the agricultural interests and means of transportation, together with the general increase of wealth and rapid advances made in material progress, the people are now more strongly impressed with the wisdom and importance of the protective policy than ever before since the organization of the Government.

THE MORRISON TARIFF.

The so-called Morrison tariff, manufactured in New York City by order of the Free-Trade League, under the inspiration of the American members of the English Cobden club, strikes directly at the policy of protection, and aims a death-blow at many of our important industries, while none of them are allowed to escape its crippling influences.

In order to present these effects more clearly to this House and the country, I have had prepared, from official sources, a series of statistical tables, showing in detail the amount of duties collected during the last fiscal year under the operation of the present tariff. In connection with this I will present the estimated amount of revenue that will be realized during a similar period—the bulk of the importation being the same—under the working of the Morrison tariff, together with the increase and decrease of duty on specified articles and the not decrease in the aggregate of the year's receipts. These tables were compiled under the supervision of Dr. Edward Young, chief of the United States Statistical Bureau, from official records and careful estimates, and can be accepted as substantially correct: In order to present these effects more clearly to this House and the

An analysis of the proposed tariff, and its effects upon the revenues, on the basis of last year's importations, will now be given; and some of its bearings upon the nation's industries will be briefly indicated.

COTTON MANUFACTURES.

On plain unbleached cottons the duty is reduced from 5 cents to  $2\frac{1}{2}$  cents per square yard; on bleached cottons, from  $5\frac{1}{2}$  to  $3\frac{1}{2}$  cents per z<sub>2</sub> cents per square yard; on bleached cottons, from 5½ to 3½ cents per square yard; and on stained, painted, or printed cotton goods, from 5½ to 4 cents per square yard. On these three items there is an annual reduction of revenue amounting to \$344,843.88. On other cotton manufactures the duties are reduced in about the same ratio, making another annual loss of revenue amounting to \$1,384,906.29.

It is true the aggregate reduction of duty on cotton manufactures is less than $2,000,000, and this would be more than made up by the increase of importations under the lower rate of duties. But is it sagacious statesmanship to reduce the tariff one-half and double the sagacious statesmanship to reduce the tarm one-han and double the importations of cotton goods? To bring our cottons from abroad and close up our own manufactories? The total importation of cotton fabrics in 1875 amounted in value to $24,197,443.91. During the first month of the present year England has sent to our markets 800,878,210 yards of cotton goods, and the people are complaining of hard times and no employment for our operatives because our own mills are either closed or running on half time.

The raw cotton is raised in the United States, sent abroad to be manufactured, and then returned to our markets, thus taking the work and wages from our own operatives, and the bread from their families, to afford employment to those of other countries, while their employers pocket the profits on the goods thus manufactured abroad for American consumption.

Our skilled labor and manufacturing machinery are equal to that of any other country, and our own factory operatives have a legitimate claim to the benefits derived from the manufacture of all cotton goods consumed by our own people, without being compelled to submit to half pay and poor fare as is the case in European countries.

Under the present tariff this industry has developed rapidly in the United States. Not only have the older manufacturing States largely increased their facilities and the variety of their courtry and mixed.

increased their facilities and the variety of their cotton and mixed fabrics, but mills are being erected in the South and in other sections where they were before entirely unknown.

The main portion of all the cotton grown in the world is the product of our own country, and it is a reflection on the wisdom of our legislators and an injustice to our artisans and workmen and women to send the raw material abroad and buy it back manufactured into goods for home consumption. Rather should this be the great manufacturing center for cotton goods for the nations where the raw material cannot be produced.

However, under the present tariff, our manufacturing facilities have been more than doubled during the last fourteen years. Cotton goods are just beginning to be exported in considerable quantities to other countries, even to England; and they are pronounced to be superior in quality to those of the country just named. There is every indication that if this industry is not made to suffer by our injudicious tampering with the tariff, the aggregate annual exports, from this time forward, will continue to increase rapidly. During the last year unexpected success has attended this enterprise. Our manufacturers are competing successfully even in the English markets, by offering for sale there a better article than England's own product. The Fall River correspondent of the Boston Journal (a good authority) writes that-

The beneficial results accruing from the shipment of cotton goods to England are becoming every day more apparent, and the outlook is decidedly hopeful and encouraging. The success of Mr. George F. Hathaway's visit to England is shown in the great activity and busy bustle among the Fall River mills. About fifteen thousand pieces of print cloths, one-eighth of the entire production of the city, are now exported each week, and for these goods better net prices are received abroad than at home. It has been said that the Fall River manufacturers sought by this movement simply to "tide over" an unusually depressed period, and the inference has been drawn that with the return of a brisk home demand they would gladly throw the goods back again into the home channels. But the developments that have arisen from the endeavor have given to the project a degree of certainty and of permanence that the manufacturers themselves did not anticipate. They expected to sell mainly the twenty-six-inch goods, which are two inches narrower than the American make and to manufacture which would involve very little change in their machinery. They are now selling these goods and receiving as high a price as the twenty-eight-inch goods bring in this country, while the cost of making is much loss.

The wider styles of print cloths so much in vogue in England, the thirty-two, thirty-four, and thirty-six inch goods, they did not expect to sell. But the English buyers offered such desirable prices for these goods that the manufacturers decided to make such changes in their machinery as would furnish a stated supply. But larger orders have been received and are yet coming forward and several corporations are now placing their mills largely on this kind of cloth. Manufacturers elsewhere, moreover, are consulting with spinners respecting the preparation of their mills for similar goods, and in neighboring States arrangements to make a like description of cloth for exportation have been or are being made. These things, therefore, indicate that the manufacturers feel assured that the movement has in it elements of permanence and of stability, and they are now taking means to form an association and to agree in any event to ship abroad a certain portion of their production. The superiority of these goods as compared with those of English manufacture is readily apparent. They are made of better cotton, are firmer and of much handsomer texture. The goods on the other side are so filled with sizing that when they come to be printed the shrinkage is enormous, averaging, is is said, fully one-fifth, while the shrinkage of the American cloths is comparatively trifling, averaging at the outside not over 5 per cent. In fact so high an opinion have the English manufacturers of the cottons made on this side that they not unfrequently place upon their foreign shipments the American trademark in order to dispose of them to better advantage.

Under the practical operation of the proposed reduction of the present tariff this condition of affairs would be immediately changed. England would flood our markets with her poorer goods produced by cheaper labor, and cripple the power that now provides for the home markets and sends a surplus abroad. The foreign demand for our staple products will, at best, be only a secondary consideration, and can never compensate for the loss of the greater demand at home, destroyed by a reduction of the tariff for the benefit of British importations, and the unlimited introduction of foreign manufactures.

IRON AND STEEL INDUSTRIES.

Following the Morrison bill in the order of its arrangement, the next attack is upon our iron and steel manufactories. The duties on the line of iron and steel and manufactures thereof are reduced by the proposed tariff, on a year's importations, to the extent of $1,192,758.40. The duty on rolled iron generally is reduced one-half, bar-iron of the ordinary sizes and forms being placed at one-half cent per pound. Pig-iron is reduced from $7 to $5 per ton, or about 30 per cent. This is $1 less per ton than it was in 1862, and $4 per ton less than in 1864 and on to 1869, under which our iron-works received an impetus they had never before obtained. The London Times of a late date says:

The high tariff so long maintained by the United States has at length brought her producing power nearly up to her requirements.

But the same paper also remarks that the reduction of the duty to $5 per ton will enable England to compete successfully in the American markets. This is the object of the framers of the new tariff, and if the bill should ever become a law they will succeed in the effort. Under the present tariff England sends more malleable and other iron, excepting pig, to the United States than she does to Germany, Belgium, France, Spain, and Austria combined. Their own official returns, copied from the London Times, show the following total exports from England for 1870, 1874, and 1875:

Exports of malleable and other iron, excepting pig.

In the proposed tariff iron and steel generally are reduced 30 to 35 per cent. of existing rates. In commenting upon the practical results of this reduction, Mr. D. H. Mason, an experienced writer on the subject, remarks in the Chicago Inter-Ocean, in response to the popular voice of the country, that—

It is scarcely necessary to say that such reductions would be absolutely ruinous in the present state of these industries. The magnificent establishments that have grown up within a few years in this city and in other localities in the West would be closed without a hope of re-opening. Possibly the older works of the East would hold out for a few months, but every business man knows that a reduction of the duties on iron and steel of 30 to 50 per cent. of existing rates would bring heavy importations immediately from England, Belgium, and Germany to stock the market at ruinously low prices, the great object being to silence our own production and compel a surrender of the whole field to foreigners hereafter. If, in effecting this result, temporary losses to the foreign producers became necessary, they would be cheerfully submitted to. After the control of the market was secured they could make such prices as they pleased and amply re-imburse themselves.

Yet, with these facts before us, the proposition is to throw open our markets and obtain our supplies of iron and steel manufactures from other countries, while iron-ore and coal are more abundant in the United States than in any other portion of the globe, and the capacity for manufacturing is fully equal to the present and prospective demand.

But labor is better paid here than elsewhere, and a reduction of the tariff would only open our markets to be supplied with the products of the cheaper labor of other countries. Is it not wiser to sustain our present tariff and give our own workmen the opportunity of manufacturing for the home market and for others wherever our goods are wanted? We have long depended upon England for the principal proportion of our iron and steel, hardware and cutlery; but under the effects of the present tariff the tables are turning, and our manufacturers are finding ready and profitable markets in that country. Referring to American competition with Sheffield, the newly elected president of the chamber of commerce of that city asserted in his recent inaugural address that it is not at all likely that Sheffield will ever again have anything like the trade with the United States she formerly enjoyed. Twenty years ago an American hardware-store contained chiefly Sheffield, Birmingham, and Wolverhampton goods, while a small space in the back part of the premises was devoted to American "notions." Now the state of affairs, says the president, is reversed. The Sheffield and Birmingham goods are put in a "corner," while the manufactures of America and Germany have extended so as to fill nearly the whole store. The newly elected president of the chamber of commerce of Sheffield went on to say that he had never seen, in all his experience, any article turned out of a well-established and reputable factory in the United States "that was not good of its kind." And articles such as files, table cutlery, &c., made only by hand in Sheffield, are produced by machinery in the United States. That the trade of Sheffield has been seriously affected by the en-

That the trade of Sheffield has been seriously affected by the energy, enterprise, and skill of American manufacturers is an established fact, and is receiving additional corroboration every day. The testimony of the English periodicals on this subject should be received as conclusive. Referring to it, the Ironmonger says that "in the management of the Bessemer 'plant' the Americans must be yielded the palm; and this palm was yielded even by the English steel-masters themselves at their great Barrow meeting. The real truth is that the Americans have learned how to make steel rails as well if not better than Englishmen, and there is no good to be obtained by hiding the fact." This concession is from an English source. In remarking upon it, the Pittsburgh (Pennsylvania) Daily Dispatch of a late date says:

a late date says:

The cautious admission quoted above was drawn out, it appears, by a recent report on the metal trade made by the American consulat Sheffield. The manufacturers of steel there had for some time experienced a great falling off in the amount of sales they made to Americans; but they did not anticipate that they would lose the trade of this country altogether, as they are very likely to do within a short time. According to the published figures there has been a rapid decline within three years in the importation of English steel. In 1873 Sheffield sent steel goods to this country the value of which is estimated at considerably more than eight millions and a quarter of dollars. In the following year her exports to this country were something over six millions, and last year they only amounted to $3,456,160, being a reduction in three years of about $5,000,000. But what is more encouraging is the fact that for a period of eleven months "not a single ton of Sheffield rails has entered the country. For the last nine months of 1873 and 1874, respectively, the value of the rails imported hither was $1,311,890 and $1,136,610."

Supposing the Morrison tariff had been in operation, would the facts of the case be as they are here stated? It is true the stringency of the times may have had something to do in checking the importation of Sheffield steel; but a protective tariff was the main cause. It is this that has given us the control of our own markets, and is enabling us to compete successfully abroad; a thing unknown under the operation of the low tariff prior to 1862.

LEAD AND COPPER.

In the Morrison tariff the duty on lead and manufactured lead goods is reduced 30 and up to 50 per cent., except on one unimportant quality of pigs and bars; another direct blow at a valuable home industry.

On copper in plates, bars, ingots, and pigs the duties are reduced from 5 cents per pound to 2 cents, while copper ore is transferred over to the free list in the provision for the admission, duty free, of "mineral and bituminous substances in a crude state, not otherwise provided for."

Here a double blow is dealt at this new and important industry. The larger portion of the duty is removed from prepared copper, and copper ore is transferred to the free list. It is arranged that copper "not otherwise provided for" shall pay a duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem. This would make on ingots, cakes, pigs, and bars between 4 and 5 cents per pound duty. But the effect of this is very ingeniously got round by allowing "plate" copper to come in at 2 cents per pound. It is easy to see that plates can be made to such thickness as to be merely cakes rolled once, in which form copper, in large quantities, would reach our markets at a duty of only 2 cents per pound; and an easy and effectual way it would be to ruin the copper-producers of our own country and close up the mines.

But the severer blow is that aimed at our mining industries in the copper regions, by far the greater portion of which lie within the district which I have the honor to represent here. They, together

But the severer blow is that aimed at our mining industries in the copper regions, by far the greater portion of which lie within the district which I have the honor to represent here. They, together with those other industries which represent the hundred iron mines, the numerous blast-furnaces and rolling-mills, are spread over the upper peninsula of Michigan, and give employment and homes to laborers representing a population of nearly eighty thousand souls. There the mineral native copper is obtained either in masses or in

There the mineral native copper is obtained either in masses or in a state of comparative purity, requiring simply a mechanical process to crush and separate it from the rock, when it is at once prepared for smelting into ingots of pure copper, or into cakes, pigs, or bars, to meet the demands of business and the practical arts.

In 1873, there were 14,910 tons of pure metallic copper, in various

In 1873, there were 14,910 tons of pure metallic copper, in various forms, manufactured and sent to market from this region, at a value of $8,200,500. In 1874, the yield was 17,327 tons, 4,500 tons of which were exported abroad, and the balance, 12,827 tons, were worked up at home in the prosecution of our own industries in the various sections of the country. In 1875 the product was 17,500 tons, and the amount exported a trifle in excess of that of 1874.

It is proposed now in the Morrison tariff to admit copper ores free

Nothing is clearer to the intelligent mind than that this will of duty. not only close nearly every copper mine in the country, but utterly preclude the idea of ever utilizing the rich ores of many of the western Territories.

Already the Chili copper mines in South America are supplying England with copper; and under the system of cheap peon labor there, Chilian copper ores can be landed in Baltimore and in other tide-water cities of the United States, and there smelted and placed on the market in direct competition with the product of the Lake Superior mines, at less cost than it could be delivered in those places or any other part of the Union, or the Chilian care can be carried. or any other part of the Union; or the Chilian ores can be carried to Swansea, there smelted, and imported under the two-cent-per-pound provision of the bill.

It will throw some light on this question to show here what rela-It will throw some light on this question to show here what relation the Chilian mines already bear to the copper industries in some other portions of the world, especially England, and the relation they will bear to our own country, if copper ores should be transferred to the free list of imported goods. A recent number of the official paper, published in Houghton County, Michigan, and edited by J. R. Devereux, esq., furnishes the following reliable statement:

LAKE SUPERIOR COPPER REGION AND THE TARIFF—CHILI AND ENGLAND CONSIDERED.

LAKE SUPERIOR COPPER REGION AND THE TARIFF—CHILI AND ENGLAND CONSIDERED.

The mineral statistics of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland for the year 1874 have just been received. The information generally is of interest to those concerned in mining, but we do not propose to dwell on anything but what directly reflects on copper mining.

The returns published include 119 copper mines, distributed as follows: In England 100, Wales 11, and in Ireland 8. The total quantity of copper ores produced in the year was 78,521 tons, worth to the sellers £336,415, and producing after being smelted 4,981 tons 11 cwt. of ingot copper. Comparisons with our own mines will not be out of order; and here we would remark that the copper ores obtained and smelted from all the mines in question equal just one-third of the quantity of rock stamped in the same year by the Calumet and Hecla mine. The yield of fine copper from the mines of the United Kingdom is equal to nearly half the amount produced by our leading mine in the same year. This shows the importance of this one mine in our midst, and gives an idea of the magnitude of the concern that we cannot obtain looking at it every day, without comparing it with the contide world.

The returns from the whole number of mines show a falling off from the preceding year (1873) of about 5 per cent., the fine copper produced being 269 tons less. This, however, does not apply to the two counties of Devon and Cornwall, which for the past year or two have maintained their position as producers. In 1872 Chili bars averaged £92 per ton, and that price encouraged the copper miner, especially as in the year before the same brand of metal sold as low as £64 per ton. The stimulus lent by the better price then admitted of a check in the downward career of the Cornish mines, which unless again applied will soon be evident.

For the ten years ending 1873 at Chili bars averaged £78 l0s. The latest reports quote them at £81 10s., and the figures of last year, compared with the results of copp

Subjoined are the figures referred to:

In 1874,	Devon and Cornwall	53,	281

Showing that in 1874 the quantity of copper ore raised in the two counties was only one-third of the quantity produced in 1865. Can anything show clearer than this that the English copper mines cannot live with the prices that have ruled on an average the ten years in question!

A glance here at the returns of copper from Lake Superior for the same years cannot be amiss:

A glance at the Lake Superior copper industry will show the disastrous results that must inevitably follow the introduction of copper ores free of duty. Up to the discovery and working of the Calumet and Hecla deposit, investments in the copper region had been for the most part a losing business. Out of all the numerous ventures by capital in that way, but two or three mines had succeeded in making any return for the expenditures; and in those instances of success the profits were not extravagant as against the risks in-curred. This was the state of things more than twenty years after the curred. This was the state of things more than twenty years after the opening of the work of the copper region. It was the condition of affairs when by the act of February 24, 1869, Congress, in view of the distressed condition of the copper interests, after a very animated and protracted controversy, passed over the Executive veto what was then known as the "copper-tariff" bill, which fixed the precise duties which the Morrison bill proposes either to reduce or abolish. That bill was passed because of the fact, which was then demonstrated, that our industries were being crippled and threatened with complete ruin by the competition of the ores which this bill proposes to put on the free list. the free list.

For the year 1868 the Lake Superior mines produced only 9,985 tons of pure copper, as against 17,327 tons for 1874 and 17,500 tons for 1875. At that time this industry was regarded with distrust, and must, unaided by favorable legislation, have sooner or later been abandoned; and, instead of adding, as it does now, millions of dollars annually to the wealth of the nation, and of enabling us to compete successfully for a price for our surplus in the markets of the world, both Government and people would be to-day at the mercy of the other copper-producing countries, where labor costs less than half that it does in the United States.

To-day there are but two mines to be relied upon for dividends outside of the Calumet and Heela. These are the Quincy and Central, and they make but a small return. All of the remaining portion of the investments in copper mines—and the amount is millions of dollars—afford no returns but hope, which never dies, or certainly that would not remain to most of them to this time.

It is notoriously true that the business of mining is one of great risk, requiring the prospect of a large return to invite capital, which would otherwise prefer a venture giving a smaller but safer and surer

And now, with the duty on copper as it stands to-day, the two mines that were for many years the only successful ventures of the region, Cliff and Minnesota, having been abandoned, and only two, Central and Quincy, making small returns, save the Calumet and Hecla, the cost of production being at least seventeen cents per pound at the market for these two, it is evident that, if the duty on copper should be abrogated, or reduced even, the result on every interest outside of the Calumet and Hecla mine must be unmitigated ruin. It is not possible in such a case that any industry of this region, save the Calumet and Heela, could work for any considerable time, and the Government would thus crush out of existence—for through this whole country the effect would be the same—every copper mine but the Calumet and Hecla, which would then be its only reliance for that mineral. And how soon that might fail the history of the Minnesota and the Cliff affords some evidence.

Could anything be more unwise than such a course for the Government to pursue, or more destructive for the mines? While the siren hope still leads them on the great mass of the mines, though making no return for the investment—only promising well for the future—still add their portion of material wealth to the country, are still producers, and employ and pay the labor. Disturb this position, leave only one mine in the region at work, and labor will at once assume a new phase, and the Calumet and Hecla will no longer produce copper at the present figures.

It would be the most unwise thing for the Government and the most unjust thing for the mining industries to remove or reduce the duty. It may be remarked further that the Cliff mine was abandoned by some of the most sagacious business men in this country as being unprofitable to follow longer; and the inducement that brought new capital to the investment was the protection which the Government extended to the copper interest. Without that this mine would be a ruin and a wreck to-day. It has been worked four years by the present company; and if the duty is removed the property will become worthless and the original investment will be sunk. Labor will be sent elsewhere to find employment—three hundred men are now employed—and the additional wealth that the conner raised gives to the ployed-and the additional wealth that the copper raised gives to the country ceases. The Cliff is only an instance of capital recently invested in abandoned mines and new ventures. The result will be the same in every case.

SILK AND SILK GOODS.

This industry is of comparatively recent origin in our country. The fact, however, that mulberry orchards could be successfully cultivated, and silk-worms propagated to advantage, has long been known from actual test. But it was not until the tariffs of 1862 and subsequent actual test. But it was not until the tariffs of 1862 and subsequent years increased the duties on imported silk and silk goods that attention to any considerable extent was given to the culture and manufacture of silk in the United States. The silk industry has from that period steadily increased up to the present time.

Of the average annual value of silk goods used—amounting to about $60,000,000—one-half of the entire quantity is now manufactured in the United States. At the rate at which this industry has been developed during the last decade, there is no reason to doubt that in a few years more, under the present tariff, the American product will be equal to the entire demand, with a large surplus for export. But under the proposed tariff it is not possible that this industry can long survive against the large increase of imported silks that will inevitably take place. Imported silk goods that are now paying a duty of 35 per cent. will, under the proposed tariff, be admitted at a duty of 25 per cent. Goods paying 40 will enter our markets at 30; and those silks now charged 50 and 60 per cent. will be admitted at 40 per cent. duty

Those familiar with the facts know that this comparatively new enterprise cannot successfully, under the reduced rates of duty, compete with France and other countries that have for centuries devoted their capital and cheap labor to the production of silk fabrics. It is unreasonable to expect such a result. Our silk industries must be protected or they must be abandoned. The new tariff reduces the annual receipts for duties on imported silk goods to the extent of $4,234,674.04. No intelligent person has the presumption to claim that the home industry can long survive this radical reduction of the tariff under which our silk factories were built up and their products increased up to the aggregate of $30,000,000 per annum.

WOOL AND WOOLEN MANUFACTURES

On wool and woolen fabrics, including carpetings, the annual duties undergo a reduction of $8,259,087.70, by the proposed change of tariff. On first and second class wools the duties are reduced about 50 per cent. This aims a serious blow at one of the important farming interests, and sends the manufacturers abroad for their supplies ing interests, and sends the manufacturers abroad for their supplies of wool, now obtained mainly at home. Our average annual product of wool, according to the best authorities, is 177,000,000 pounds, which, at the present average price, nets the farmers an annual income of $50,000,000. The proposed reduction of the tariff will enable the wool-growing districts of the Argentine Republic to stock our markets with wool from that quarter, raised at comparatively little cost by the naked and poorly fed "peon" laborers of La Plata. To show the strength of the competition from that quarter it is only necessary to quote the expect of wool from Busnos Ayres and note its essary to quote the export of wool from Buenos Ayres, and note its rapid annual increase, as follows:

The bales weigh on an average 400 kilograms.

This is down to 1866; but subsequent years indicate a similar increase, though the exact figures are not at my command.

We can see clearly in this statement the source of our supplies under the operation of the proposed tariff, and can have no difficulty in estimating the disastrous results that will follow to the agricultural interests of our own country.

Another effect will be the decrease of the present supply of mutton, with a corresponding increase in the cost of this and other table meats. It is not the farmer and the wool manufacturer alone who will suffer, but the entire people.

But the wool and the nutritious food are not the only benefits derived from successful sheep-raising. It has been fully demonstrated that sheep, through the peculiar nutritiousness of their manure and the facility with which it may be distributed, are found to be the most economical and certain means of solving the highest problem in agriculture-that of constantly renewing the productiveness of the in agriculture—that of constantly renewing the productiveness of the land. It is estimated on good authority that fifteen hundred sheep folded on an acre of land for twenty-four hours, or one hundred sheep for fifteen days, would manure the land sufficiently to carry it through four years' rotation. It was the sagacious Thiers who said—

The agricultural industry of France cannot dispense with sheep.

The threatened destruction of this industry in our own country cannot fail to inspire the farmers and the people generally with the most serious concern.

With rare exceptions the wool manufacturers do not ask a reduction of the duty on wool. Our home product of wool under the fostering effects of the present and former tariffs, has been so increased in quantity and quality that they prefer the existing adjustment of the tariff on wool and woolen manufacturers to any change that can be

A reference to the proposed tariff will show that as with wool so with woolen and mixed fabrics the tariff is reduced 25 to 35 and even

Since 1862, under the increased tariff, our wool-manufacturing mills have been doubled in their number and capacity, while the increase in the quantity and variety, and the improvements in the quality of their products have kept pace with the enlargement of their facili-ties. Three-fourths of our annual consumption of woolen and mixed goods (the aggregate of the home and foreign supply amounting to $240,000,000) are the product of our own mills and factories; and our facilities are capable of supplying the entire consumption of the country. Yet our free-trade advocates would open our markets to half-paid labor competition from abroad, close the doors of our mills, and turn our thousands of operatives upon the streets, as has already been done on several memorable occasions through the operation of low tariffs.

Contrary to the claim of the advocates of free trade, that a high tariff permanently increases the price of the home and foreign prodnct, it is daily demonstrated by actual experience that, with rare special exceptions, the effects are directly the opposite. Under the operation of the protective tariffs of the last decade, we are not only, as has been stated, producing double the quantity of woolen and mixed goods each year, but the qualities are better, the varieties greater, and the prices are lower in most cases, measured by a gold standard, than they were ever before in this country, and cheaper even than imported goods, until the imported article has undergone an actual reduction in price in order to effect sales in our markets. I will quote from a carefully-prepared article in the Republic Magazine in support of the well-established fact here presented. The writer remarks

John L. Hayes, esq., of Boston, secretary of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, in a recent report on the progress of American manufactures, says: "We have, since the protective tariff of 1862, succeeded in making the European palace carpet, known as the Axminster carpet, superior in strength and wear to the French carpet, and in beauty and finish so exact a copy of the original that, side by side, it is difficult to detect any difference. These, "says Mr. Hayes, "we make at so low a cost that we have compelled the manufacturer of the foreign article to reduce his price a dollar or two a yard, although the American Axminsters are frequently put upon the market and sold for the foreign article." In Brussels and other rich and expensive carpets similar results have been reached, and the prospect now is that, as in the case of iron, cutlery, steel shovels, watches, clocks, sewing-machines, &c., our carpets will soon find profitable markets on the other side of the Atlantic.

Of home manufactures there has been brought out within the last five years a the Atlantic.

Of home manufactures there has been brought out within the last five years a very large class of dress goods, embracing nearly every variety required for ladies' wear. "Our silks," says Mr. Hayes, "our lusters, our serges, and a great variety of cotton stuffs, of a class not made in this country at all until within the last five years, challenge comparison with any similar goods made abroad. And in the article of carpets," he continues, "I say without hesitation that we surpass the manufacture of any other country on the globe. But the great fact to be looked at," he adds, "is that we have not only done all this, but we have been enabled to make these goods cheaper through the competition that grows out of our protective system."

these goods cheaper through the competition that grows out of our protective system."

If the reader, in any of our larger cities where a wholesale business is done, will take the trouble to make inquiry, he will find that flaunel goods (and they are the basis of cloths and other woolen fabrics) are on a goid value from 15 to 20 per cent. cheaper now than they were in 1860. This fact is well known to the wholesale trade, though retail establishments may not have so informed their customers. The same is true of many other descriptions of manufactures. Says Mr. Hayes:

"We make all our undergoods, stockings, hosiery, and goods for underclothing, amounting to some $40,000,000. Three or four years ago we made no goods of the class that are made atted to the form; but we have succeeded in making those, also, not by hand, but by machinery, and surpassing in quality any goods of the kind that are made abroad. The result of this has been that American competition has actually reduced the prices of the foreign articles."

This is our experience under a protective tariff; and when our currency, at no distant day, reaches a gold value, the prices of all staple and most of the minor articles of manufacture will range lower than at any former period in our history, excepting on extraordinary occasions under the pressure of a crisis or other unfavorable circumstances. Free traders may continue to spin fine theories, but Alexander Hamilton was right when he said that under protection, "the internal competition which takes place soon does away with everything like monopoly, and by degrees reduces the price of the article to the minimum of a reasonable profit on the capital invested."

MARBLE IN BLOCKS AND SLABS. MARBLE IN BLOCKS AND SLABS.

Marble abounds in our own country, and has become an important industry; yet it would appear that the framers of the proposed tariff prefer to have our supplies brought from abroad. During the last year there were paid into the United States Treasury $205,049.86 in duties collected on imported marble. The duty is 50 cents per cubic foot. The Morrison tariff reduces it to 30 cents. The increased importation under the reduced tariff cannot fail to seriously injure, if not wholly destroy, the home industry, especially in the districts near the sea-coast.

PENCILS AND PENS.

Last year a revenue of $61,389.83 was derived from imported pencils of wood filled with lead; but on an importation of a similar quantity under the Morrison tariff there will be a loss of revenue amounting o $19,481.12.

On the year's importation of imported metallic pens the loss of revenue will be $15,847.98. These reductions of duty will be made up y increased importations; but the effect will be to largely defeat the efforts of our own manufacturers of pencils and pens, and throw the business into the hands of foreigners. Whatever operates to diminish the number of artificers at home tends to impoverish the industrial We have the materials and facilities to manufacture all the pencils and pens required in the country. It is not so much the loss of revenue as the transfer of our industries to our foreign competitors that the proposed tariff aims to accomplish. Under its operation importations will be largely increased; but in the same ratio our home industries will be diminished, and our artisans and their families be made to suffer for want of employment. "Protection benefits the state by giving employment to the people."

OUR SOAP INDUSTRY.

All the plain and fancy soaps required should be manufactured at home, yet the returns show that during the last fiscal year $147,845.80 were collected and paid in gold into the Treasury as duties on imported soaps. It is now proposed to decrease the aggregate receipts of revenue from this source to the extent of $40,280.40. This will increase the importation and take the bread out of the mouths of our own soap manufacturers and their families.

ADDITIONS TO THE FREE LIST.

On articles transferred to the free list in the proposed tariff duties were collected during the last fiscal year to the amount of $2,468,098. But this is as nothing compared with the disastrous results that must inevitably follow to many of our important and minor industries. But, lest I should be charged with a manifestation of undue alarm, I will quote the discriminating views of D. H. Mason, esq., of Chicago, who has given much attention to the subject. He says, correctly, that—has given much attention to the subject. He says, correctly, that—

The folly and wickedness of the bill generally, as regards the greater industries of the country, as iron, wool and woolens, cottons, and the like, is exceeded when it comes to the proposed free list, in which a large number of leading articles now chiefly and in some cases wholly produced in this country are hereafter, if the bill should pass, to come from abroad. The immediate result would be to close the great chemical works, the manufactories of paints, drugs, oils, dyes, and the thousand like establishments that altogether make up an enormous aggregate of business. In many of these cases an entire independence of foreign supply has long been established, and the consumption of the country is almost wholly of its own production. In others, and this is true of most of them, there is a small importation; but in all cases the entire removal of the duty would be followed by large importations, for the time breaking the price low enough to silence our own manufactories, and then followed by an advance in price when they became masters of the field. The long catalogue of such articles now paying duty and proposed by this bill to be made free aggregates not less than two hundred millions in value as now manufactured in the United States, giving employment to 100,000 persons. Such is but an illustration of one of the classes of interests which these charlatans trifle with.

RECAPITULATION.

An analysis of the proposed tariff, under a comparison with the present rates of duty, gives the following results:

Decrease of duty from the actual receipts of the fiscal year 1875. Add amount duties not collected during eight months and three days under the provisions "less 10 per		$18, 454, 081	72
cent."— Cotton goods	3, 591, 465 69
CopperLeadWool	545, 887 23

Increase of duty ..... 20, 038, 580 85

It will be observed that the "increase of duty" is not upon goods now paying duties, but mainly upon tea and coffee, which are now admitted free of duty, and ever ought to be, so long as they do not come in competition with home products of the same articles. The amount of duty proposed to be collected from these two items is $19,216,701.14. So in future, if the proposed tariff goes into operation, the poor man's family will be taxed heavily for these two important articles of daily consumption.

Aside from the tax proposed to be levied on tea and coffee, the increased duties amount to only $821,879.71, while the decrease for the year is over $26,000,000. Practically, however, even if tea and coffee should not be taxed, there will be little or no decrease in the aggregate receipts. The duties from the increase of importations, now unusually large, will overcome the reductions proposed in the tariff, and in a very few years return a larger customs revenue than that now collected. The Morrison tariff is an invitation to foreign manufacturers to surfeit our markets with imported wares and the opporfacturers to surfeit our markets with imported wares, and the opportunity will be promptly embraced. The extent of its evil tendencies can scarcely be measured; and the country now appeals to the wisdom of this Congress to save the people from a practical realization of its fearful consequences.

Free-trade propagandists are energetically laboring to impress the people with their dogmas, and they are not without converts among the salaried classes, who are made to believe that free trade will reduce prices and increase the purchasing power of their salaries or wages. They forget that the very first tendency of a low tariff is to fill our markets with foreign products and not only reduce wages but transfer the labor to foreign countries. This has invariably been our experience in the past under low tariffs, and will be again if the Morrison reduced scale of duties should be allowed to go into operation.

Having impartially considered the proposed tariff in detail, it will be in place now to devote the few minutes more allowed me to a brief consideration of some of the fallacies of the free-trade theories in connection with the claims of the protective policy to the confidence and indorsement of the people.

FREE-TRADE FALLACIES—OUR FOREIGN COMMERCE.

One of the arguments most persistently adhered to by free-traders One of the arguments most persistently adhered to by free-traders is in support of their favorite dogma that "protection destroys foreign commerce." Like most of their claims, this one is without foundation. Our tariffs have been higher, very much higher, during the last fourteen years than ever before. During this period the increase in our foreign commerce has been great beyond precedent. Here are the official figures showing the results:

Fourteen years under partial free trade.

These are extraordinary and significant results. They are silent but unanswerable arguments against the free-trade theories and in favor of the protective policy. There is not only an unprecedented expansion of exports and imports, but it will be observed that in nearly every year the exports exceed the imports during the later period of high-tariff experience.

But this is not all. The development of every other branch of our industries during the last fourteen years of high tariffs has been equal to, and in many cases even greater than, the increase in our foreign commerce. Protection indicates development and prosperity. Free trade means a surfeit of foreign-made goods, closed factories at home, idle workmen, and hungry families.

INTERNATIONAL COMPETITION AND NATIONAL SELF-PROTECTION.

International competition is a system of peaceful warfare. The present English policy is a system of peacetil warrare. Each nation considers only its own interests in the struggle for ascendency. The present English policy is a system of so-called free trade, but her batteries of factories were erected, put in successful operation, and fully established in advance of other nations, under the most rigid and thorough system of protection ever maintained against foreign competition. At a subsequent period, when her manufacturing power had become thoroughly developed, the grand idea was conceived of making that the manufacturing center of and for the world, to which all raw material should come, and from which all manufactured goods would be exported for the use of the entire human family. Ireland and her West India and other colonies were prohibited from refining their own sugar or manufacturing their own goods. Carey, in his Social Science, says:

In his Social Science, says:

The first attempt at manufacture in the American colonies was followed by interference on the part of the British Legislature. In 1710 the House of Commons declared that "the erecting of manufactories in the colonies tended to lessen their dependence on Great Britain;" and the board of trade was ordered to report upon the subject. In 1722 the exportation of hats from province to province was prohibited and the number of hatters' apprentices limited. In 1720 the erection of any mill or engine for splitting or rolling iron was prohibited; but pig-iron might be sent to England duty free, thence to be returned in a finished form. Later Lord Chatham declared that he would not allow the colonists to make for themselves so much as even a single hobail.

When by these and other arbitrary measures England had obtained supremacy over the world in her manufacturing industries her pro-tective policy was relaxed, and a system of free trade was proposed tective poincy was relaxed, and a system of free trade was proposed to the world, with an invitation to all other governments to follow her example. The proposition was not accepted. Other nations, under the policy of protection then and still in vogue, put forth their efforts to increase their own manufacturing facilities, and have sucenors to increase their own manufacturing facilities, and have succeeded in competing successfully against the odds already obtained in England by prior development.

Failing in securing a system of free trade with other nations, England's next resort was to international commercial treaties, in which she was partially successful. France and some other powers were forced or persuaded to modify their existing tariffs to some extent, much to their subsequent regret.

Such are some of the means adopted by England to secure free trade with other portions of the world. Our own country has never yielded its right to control its own foreign commerce, although it has been for years and still is the objective point to which England's energies have been directed in order to secure a reduction of our tariffs. At the present time the Cobden club is doing much to mislead the public mind, both in America and elsewhere, and mold the popular sentiment in favor of free trade. It has already in its membership 691 persons, of whom 496 are residents of Great Britain, and 195 of various foreign countries, embracing the United States 56, Australia 3, Austro-Hungarian Empire 12, Belgium 10, Brazil 2, Canada 2, Denmark 2, Egypt 1, France 36, Germany 14, Holland 12, Italy 14, Mexico 1, Norway 2, Portugal 5, Russia 8, Servia 1, Spain 9, Sweden 4, and Switzerland I. Some of these members are men of enormous opulence, as Baron Lionel N. de Rothschild, Nathaniel M. de Rothschild, M. P., and A. T. Stewart. A very wide range of pursuits are represented in and A. T. Stewart. A very wide range of pursuits are represented in the list of names—members of Parliament, princes, public functionaries, Representatives in Congress, foreign ministers, college professors, editors, and so on—clearly evidencing the vast power and extent of combination existent in the association, and the energetic influences which can be made to proceed from its deliberate action. Its objects, its mode of operation, and the character of its work are thus outlined in the "Report of the committee of the Cobden club, presented at the annual general meeting, June 26, 1875," as follows:

out filled in the "Report of the committee of the Cooden cito, presented at the annual general meeting, June 26, 1875," as follows:

During the year 1874 the committee distributed the following works:

1. Professor Thorold Rogers's Cooden and Political Opinion, (820 copies,) presented to the members of the club and to the free libraries.

2. Bastiat's Essays on Political Economy, a selection in English, (3,000 copies,) presented to members of the club and to free libraries, to workingmen's clubs, mechanics' institutes, &c., at home, in the United States, and in the colonies.

3. The History of England from 1832 to the Present Time, by Rev. W. Nassau Molesworth, (100 copies,) presented to the free libraries.

4. The Financial Reform Almanae for 1874, (3,000 copies,) presented to the members of the club, to the free libraries, and workingmen's clubs, &c.

5. Report of the Proceedings at the Dinner of the Cobden club, 1874, (Right Hon. W. E. Baxter, M. P., in the chair,) with the committee's report of the work of the club from its foundation, and an appendix relating to free trade in the colonies, (15,000 copies,) circulated among the members of the club and the various libraries, public institutions, associations, &c., with which the Cobden club is in communication, at home and abroad.

Since the beginning of the present year the new series of Cobden club Essays on Local Government and Taxation, which was announced in the last report, has been published, (2,000 copies.) The volume has been presented to all the members of the club, and to the free libraries at home and some of those in the United States, in the colonies, and on the continent. The number of copies sold from the publishers (312) will be found entered in the statement of receipts and expenditures up to the present date, which will be laid on the table.

The committee are glad to state that the work has been received with approval; and they desire to return their cordial thanks to the writers of the essays, to the literary committee, and to Mr. J. W.

The Financial Reform Almanac for 1015 (1,000 copies) has been purely distributed as before.

At the last general meeting the committee submitted the following proposals with regard to the future action of the club:

"1. To publish in a cheap form a selection from Mr. Cobden's speeches and works, and books and pamphlets calculated to further the cause of free trade, for circulation in Great Britain, the United States, and the British colonies.

"2. To assist in promoting lectures and publications on political economy and instituting rewards for essays in accordance with Mr. Cobden's views.

"3. To communicate with friends in other countries with a view of circulating free-trade publications and helping on measures likely to promote international amity."

free-trade publications and helping on measures likely to promote international amity."

With reference to the first proposal, the committee have communicated with Mr. Henry Richard, M. P., who reports that he is actively engaged in collecting and preparing the correspondence of Mr. Cobden for publication. The committee will lend their best aid in promoting this work.

The committee also propose to issue a revised edition of Sir Louis Mallet's Essay on the Political Writings of Cobden. Five thousand copies will be circulated. In order to carry out the second proposal, the literary committee has been empowered to offer prizes in connection with the lectures on political economy and English history, organized in several of the large provincial towns by the Cambridge University Extension Syndicate, the prizes to consist of sets of standard books relating to the subjects taught.

With a view to giving effect to the last proposal, the committee have authorized a translation to be prepared of the Hon. David Wells's speech on the "Results of Protection in the United States," delivered before the Cobden club 27th June, 1873, and 2,000 copies to be printed and circulated in Italy, where the interests of commerce are immediately threatened by the proposals of the Italian government in the direction of a protective tariff.

The gold medal of the Cobden club has been awarded to M. Michel Chevalier for his eminent services in the cause of free trade.

Here we obtain some knowledge of the efforts made by this wealthy and zealous organization in behalf of England's policy of free trade. Its efforts are directed more persistently against the United States than any other country. It is stated on reliable authority that the club is in communication with 256 public libraries in the United States, the Free-Trade League in New York, the Young Men's Free-Trade Association in Boston, various diplomatic representatives, Trade Association in Boston, various diplomatic representatives, members of Congress, and nearly all of our educational institutions. Among its members in the United States are: C. F. Adams, J. Q. Adams, Boston; H. Adams, Harvard University; Professor A. L. Perry, Cambridge, Massachusetts; E. Atkinson, Boston; S. Bowles, Springfield, Massachusetts; W. C. Bryant, New York; J. D. Cox, Cincinnati; Hon. S. S. Cox, New York; W. L. Garrison, Boston; W. M. Grosvenor, Saint Louis; J. T. Hoffman, C. T. Lewis, Manton Marble, R. B. Minturn, C. H. Marshall, J. S. Moore, New York; Charles Nordhoff, James Redpath, Washington; A. Pell, jr., Mahlon Sands, A. T. Stewart, New York; Professor W. G. Sumner, New Haven;

George Welker, New York; H. Watterson, Louisville, Kentucky; David A. Wells, Norwich, Connecticut; Horace White, Chicago; Professor Woolsey, LL.D., New Haven, Connecticut; David D. Field, New York; Hon. L. F. Foster, Norwich, Connecticut.

This is but a portion of the Cobden club membership in the United States. Working through the New York Free-Trade League, it has States. Working through the New York Free-Trade League, it has co-operative agencies distributed over the Union, with an extensive, comprehensive, and energetic propagandism in full aggressive operation. Its publications are regularly supplied to the libraries of our literary and educational institutions, and are largely read and used as text-books on political economy by professors and students. Referring to its aggressive operations in the Western States, the Chicago Inter-Ocean says:

Inter-Ocean says:

It has influential representatives in all the strongholds which command the public mind: in the pulpit, in the press, in the college, in the counting-room, in the circle of diplomacy, in the ranks of authorship, in the legal profession, and even in Congress. And what is the ultimate object of all this association and combination! Hidden as it may be under adroit phrases and sincere as may be some of the votaries of free trade, the ultimate object is to abolish all custom-houses, to repeal all tariffs on imports, to open all ports indiscriminately to the entrance of foreign goods, in order that Great Britain—with its vast mercantile navy, its numerous insurance companies, its extensive network of branch houses, agents, factors, and banking facilities, its astute devices of consular action and diplomatic manipulation—shall become a sort of commercial sponge to soak up the profits of the world's exchanges by obtaining, through these overwhelming advantages, a monopoly control over many foreign markets. All this is projected to be accomplished in the prostituted name of "the freedom of commerce."

So much for the instrumentalities put forth by England in order to create public sentiment in the United States against the established policy of protection to our own home industries. If our democrat friends in this House will appoint another investigating committee, and direct it to trace the proposed new tariff to its origin, they will find that it was compiled under the inspiration of this same English free-trade club, with the approval of the New York Free-Trade League. It was subsequently submitted to David A. Wells for revision, and Mr. Wells is the active representative in the United States of the Cobden club, and a zealous co-operator with the New York Free-Trade League.

WILL CONGRESS RELINQUISH AN ESTABLISHED POLICY TO GRATIFY ENGLAND ?

One of the paramount obligations of Congress is to guard the interests of the people; and a leading quality of successful statesman-ship is ability to plan and carry out those measures which will best accomplish this object.

It is now conceded by every disinterested patriot in the land that reasonable legislative protection to American industries should be the established policy of the Government. This principle has always been recognized as the basis of our prosperity. It was the aim of our earliest statesmen. Washington, in his first messsage to Congress, said:

The safety and interest of the people require that they should promote such manufactures as tend to render them independent of others for essential, particularly for military, supplies.

The first act of the First Congress was prefaced by a preamble, declaring its object as follows:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debt of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufact-urers, that duties be levied on goods, wares, and merchandise imported.

In his second message to Congress Washington used this language: Congress have repeatedly, and not without success, directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactures. The object is of too much consequence not to insure a continuance of their efforts in every way which shall appear eligible.

Dr. Franklin, in 1771, thus expressed his views on the subject:

It seems the interest of all our farmers and owners of land to encourage our young manufactures, in preference to foreign ones imported among us from distant countries.

In 1779 Alexander Hamilton wrote as follows:

To maintain between the recent establishments of one country and the long-matured establishments of another country a competition on equal terms, both as to quality and price, is in most cases impracticable. The disparity in the one or in the other or in both must necessarily be so considerable as to forbid a successful rival-ship without extraordinary aid and protection from the government.

Henry Clay, in 1824, in one of his unanswerable speeches on the importance of protection, said:

Into most desirable that there should be both a home and a foreign market. But with respect to their relative superiority, I cannot entertain a doubt. The home market is first in order and paramount in importance. * * * But this home market is first in order and paramount in importance. * * * But this home market, desirable as it is, can only be created and cherished by the protection of our own legislation against the inevitable prostration of our industry, which must ensue from the action of foreign policy and legislation. * * If I am asked why unprotected industry should not succeed in a struggle with protected industry, I answer: The fact has ever been so, and that is sufficient; I reply, that unform experience evinces that it cannot succeed in such a struggle, and that is sufficient. If we speculate on the causes of this universal truth, we may differ about them. Still the indisputable fact remains. * * * The cause is the cause of the country, and it must and will prevail. It is founded on the interests and affections of the people. It is as native as the granite deeply embosomed in our mountains. General Jackson in 1824 wrote:

General Jackson, in 1824, wrote:

It is time that we should become a little more Americanized, and, instead of feeding the paupers and laborers of England, feed our own.

James Madison, in 1828, said:

A further evidence in support of the constitutional power to protect and foster manufactures by regulations of trade—an evidence that ought in itself to settle the question—is the uniform and practical sanction given in that power, for nearly forty years, with a concurrence or acquiescence of every State government throughout the same period and, it may be added, through all the vicissitudes of party which marked that period.

Mr. Adams, in a report from the Committee on Manufactures to Congress, in 1832, said:

And thus the very first act of the organized Congress united with the law of self-preservation, by the support of the government just instituted, the two objects combined in the first grant of power to Congress: the payment of the public debts and the provision for the common defense by the protection of manufactures. The next act was precisely of the same character: an act of protection to manufactures still more than of taxation for revenue.

Daniel Webster, in 1833, thus appealed to Congress in behalf of American labor:

The protection of American labor against the injurious competition of foreign labor, so far, at least, as respects general handicraft productions, is known historically to have been one end designed to be obtained by establishing the Constitution; and this object, and the constitutional power to accomplish it, ought never to be surrendered or compromised in any degree.

Abraham Lincoln, on being nominated to the Legislature of his State, in 1832, in a speech said:

I am in favor of the internal improvement system and a high protective tariff.

In three compact sentences, defining the wants of the country, President Grant thus expresses his views:

A duty only upon those articles which we could dispense with, known as luxuries, and those of which we use more than we produce.

All duty removed from tea, coffee, and other articles of universal use not produced by ourselves.

Encouragement to home products, employment to labor at living wages, and development of home resources.

Thus from the lips of Presidents and statesmen, in all periods of our country's history, we have abundant evidence of the indorsement of the policy of protection. It has always been accepted as the national, or, as Clay expressed it, the American system; and its advocates were never more strongly impressed with its importance as the basis of national prosperity than at the present time.

In looking for the cause of this we find it in the evidence afforded by the fact that, as has already been shown, our manufacturing facilities have been doubled in the last fourteen years, and a vast number of new and important branches of industry have been successfully added to those already in existence. We also find that our foreign commerce has increased a hundred per cent. in the same period and that our exports exceed our imports. Again it is shown that a wide foreign market is opening up for the sale of manufactured goods, while the foreign demand for agricultural products has increased to an average value of $450,000,000 per annum.

it a mark of statesmanship, therefore, or even of ordinary wisdom, to destroy, or even reduce, the protective features of an established tariff policy that has contributed so largely to the general development of the country? It will be well to "make haste slowly" in this movement, and consult well the voice of the country before the contemplated radical changes in the tariff are adopted, to be regretted when it may be too late to remedy the error thus committed.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, when the bill now under consideration was reported to the House I stated that its general scope was sustained by the minority of the committee, and that while we were willing to join the majority in a radical reduction of expenditures we could not fully sustain the bill, and that we should move amendments in various places, which, if adopted, will add perhaps one or one and a half millions of dollars to the bill; that notably the proposed appropriations for the Internal-Revenue Bureau were so much reduced as to seriously jeopardize the successful collection of the revenue. A more careful analysis of the bill since it has been printed confirms my opinion that amendments should be made as then suggested. The republican members of the committee entered upon the task assigned them with an earnest determination to make such reductions in the working force of the various Bureaus as was possible without injuring their efficiency. They appreciated to the fullest extent the de-pressed condition of the industries of the country. They further appreciated the fact that all business enterprises were economizing to the utmost limit and that in consequence of this depression and economical tendency the revenues would necessarily be reduced. They also appreciated the fact that the country demands a reduction of expenditures to the lowest possible limit consistent with the proper working of the Government machinery.

Mr. Chairman, entertaining these views they have, as attested by the honorable chairman of the committee, discharged the high trust conferred upon them without regard to the interest of any party, but

On this question we have planted ourselves on a purely business basis. The minority of this House stand to-day ready and willing to aid the majority in the reduction of appropriations to the lowest possible limit consistent with the proper conduct of public affairs. saying this I do not contend that we are perfect in our judgment, but I intend to exercise my best judgment in the direction here indicated, and shall act in this House in accordance therewith, and what I say for myself I concede to others on both sides of the House.

This much I have said, Mr. Chairman, because our friends on the other side have charged the minority with being the enemies of reform. What interest have the majority in economical government that we have not? Why should we want extravagant appropriations more than they?

Mr. Chairman, the country will judge us fairly. The majority cannot afford to reduce the expenditures of the Government to such an extent as to cripple the working of the machinery thereof any more than we can. Then why should we not approach this subject as intelligent business men, as I hope we all are, without seeking party advantage? Let us make these appropriations as carefully and judiciously as if it were a matter purely personal to ourselves. The chairman of the committee, who has during his long service here been the advocate of high salaries, may talk himself hoarse in protesting his submission to the will of the people in vain if in his humiliation he goes to the other extreme and by his action cripples the governmental machinery. Should his action have this result, he will next year bow his head still lower in humble submission to public judgment when he is called upon to act upon a flood of deficiency bills.

It is due the great party that has so successfully governed the country for the past sixteen years to say that its policy has been that of a steady and safe reduction of the force of Government employés since the culmination of numbers and expenses was reached in 1867. If it had control of this House to-day this policy of reduction would be strictly and inexorably adhered to. Since 1867 the reduction in the number of employés of the Treasury Department, exclusive of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, has exceeded twelve hundred, and the reduction in cost has now reached about one and a half millions of dollars. In the other Departments affected by the bill before us the reduction made since 1867 has been probably one thousand in numbers, at a saving of more than one million of dollars; making a grand total in reduction of more than twenty-two hundred in numbers, and an annual saving of two and a half millions of dollars. As we recede from the years of immense clerical force demanded by the results of war, we have annually reduced the number and cost of employés as the business would permit.

These measures of economy have been the result of the action of the legislative branch of the Government while under the control of the great party to which the nation owes its existence toaday, and in this policy of economy the executive branches have cordially co-operated. The Secretary of the Treasury has annually called the attention of Congress to the necessity of frugality and economy in expenditures, as witness the following from his last annual report to this Congress

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Frugality in administration is among the foremost and most important points of a sound financial policy. Faithful collection of the revenue and reduction of expenditures to the lowest point demanded by the necessities of government, constitute the first duty of those intrusted with making and administering the law. The obligation to adhere strictly to this duty has peculiar force while the public indebtedness is large and the industries of the country are suffering from financial depression. Rigid economy at such a time must lead to two important results: first, advancement of the credit of the Government throughout the financial world, and hence ability to refund the debt at a lower rate of interest; second, and by no means least in importance, greater willingness on the part of the people to bear the burden of taxation, when they see that their Government, like themselves, is reducing expenditures to the lowest practicable point, and applying the revenue received from them to its necessary and legitimate purposes. The general depression of business which followed the era of inflation and extravagance, through which we have just passed, has made it necessary that individuals, associations, and corporations should reduce their expenditures to the minimum; and, having done so, the tax-payers have a right to demand that the Government shall do likewise. While the interest on the public debt, and all other national obligations, must be promptly met, there are many points at which it is believed that considerable reduction of appropriations can properly be made; and the Secretary invites critical examination of all the estimates submitted to Congress. Increase of public expenditures in time of great prosperity and extravagance is accomplished by an easy process; but a corresponding reduction when the reverse comes can be brought about only by the closest vigilance and most determined resistance to every appeal for appropriations not required by the existing necessities of government.

Mr

Mr. FOSTER. This, Mr. Chairman, is sound advice, such as I trust this House will approve. The Secretary not only gives us good advice, but he acts upon it himself. The chairman of the committee referred to the fact that the appropriations for the collection of the customs were made permanent and do not pass annually under the various of Congress. Whether it is wise or not to change the present review of Congress. Whether it is wise or not to change the present form (which I understand has existed from the beginning) of making these appropriations I will not stop to discuss, but I do know that in the exercise of the discretion therein conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury he has reduced the number of employés engaged in the collection of the customs so that the annual saving will reach one and a half millions of dollars. Yet, Mr. Chairman, this very officer, with such a splendid record on the very question now so interesting to our friends on the other side, was not consulted when this bill which so much affects the Department over which he so ably presides was being prepared. I do not improperly divulge committee secrets when I say that the committee has been met by the republican Bureau officers, when their advice was sought, with a most commendable spirit; and while they could not assent in all cases to the radical reductions proposed by the committee, they have without a single exception suggested reductions in their several Bureaus, and I might with propriety add that the committee have met as much difficulty in endeavoring to satisfy their democratic friends, the officers of this House, as they have encountered from any of the republican Bureau officers

Mr. Chairman, having said this much in a general way, I propose now to discuss the bill somewhat in detail, and first let me call the attention of the House to an error in the statement made by the chairman of the committee, unintentionally no doubt, but a very important and serious error. When he introduced the bill he made this statement:

We have been able to make full comparison with the estimates for next year and the appropriations of the current fiscal year. The estimates as furnished for subjects embraced in this bill from the Departments amounted to $20,773,306.70. The appropriations for the purposes embraced in this bill for the current fiscal year were $18,734,422.20. The appropriations which we recommend for the adoption of the House are $12,799,833.61—a reduction upon the estimates of about $8,000,000 and upon the previous appropriation of about $6,000,000.

Now what are the facts? I call the attention of the committee to the last page of the bill, where it will be seen by referring to the item "for the Court of Claims, contingent expenses and pay of judgments," the amount appropriated last year was $435,390. The estimates for the year ending June 30, 1877, are $2,035,340. The amount appropri-ated by this bill is $31,000; not one cent to pay judgments of the Court of Claims, simply an appropriation for the running expenses of the court.

I now call attention to the appropriations for the operations of the mints and assay offices. It will be seen by reference to next but the last page of the bill, under the item "for the mints and assay offices," that there was appropriated last year $1,220,145; that there was estimated for the year ending June 30, 1877, $1,592,945; and that there is appropriated by this bill $728,810. The mints and assay offices in this country, the assay offices particularly, are practically self-sustaining; that is to say, the charges cover the expenses. In the first place, this bill reduces the expenses for labor very largely, as illustrated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Cochrane.] I thoroughly agree with him in his strictures upon that feature of this bill, reducing the pay of laborers in these mints. Very grave reasons should be made manifest to justify the striking down of this reasons should be made manifest to justify the striking down of this branch of the service of the country.

But my purpose in calling attention to this assay-office appropriation was to have the House understand that a very large appropria-tion is made that does not appear in the footings of the bill. Under the lead of my colleague, the late able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. Garfield,] a genuine reform was established in the matter of making certain classes of appropriations. Instead of appropriating the revenues from any given branch of the service for the maintenance of the service from whence the revenue came, he adopted in lieu thereof the policy of compelling the revenue to be paid into the Treasury and appropriations to be made therefrom—a sound principle, and one which ought not to be deviated from under any ordinary circumstances. Now this so-called reform of the committee proposes, on page 36 of the bill, as follows:

And refining and parting of bullion shall be carried on at the mints of the United States and at the assay office, New York; and it shall be lawful to apply the moneys arising from charges collected from depositors for these operations, pursuant to law, to the defraying in full of the expenses thereof, including labor, materials, wastage, and use of machinery.

This clause probably appropriates all the difference between the sum estimated for and the sum appropriated by this bill. If you will deduct from the $2,035,000 estimated for to pay judgments of the Court of Claims—for which no appropriation whatever is made by this bill—the $31,000 appropriated for the running expenses of the court, we will have a difference of $2,004,000, which by every reason of fairness should be deducted from the statement of differences of appropriations. If you will also add the amount appropriated by the provision of the bill which I have just read for mints and assay offices, there will be $844,000 more to be added to the bill. Therefore, instead of there being a reduction of $8,000,000 from the estimates, it is a reduction of but $5,000,000.

The same course of reasoning brings about the following result in reference to the appropriations made by this bill compared with those of last year: The appropriation made last year to pay judgments of the Court of Claims was $435,000; the appropriation made this year for the expenses of the court is $31,000; a difference of over $400,000. The amount appropriated by the provision of the bill which I have read is $728,000, making about $1,000,000, which by every reason of fairness should be deducted from the $6,000,000 of reduction that the chairman of the committee claims is made from the amount appropriated last year. The chairman, therefore, should have stated that the reductions from the appropriations of last year was $5,000,000 instead of $6,000,000, and that the reduction from the estimates for the year ending June 30, 1877, was $5,000,000 instead of $8,000,000. What does this bill do? We have the statement of the chairman, which you all remember and which I do not care to read at this time, in which he says that the committee adopted the unvarying rule of a reduction of 10 per cent. on the salaries and of 20 per cent. on the force of employés. What is done in the bill by that unvarying rule? I have here a table which shows that in the Bureaus of the Treasury, War, Navy, Post-Office, Agriculture, and Department of Justice there is a reduction of the number of employés of 1,034. The 20 per cent. rule of reduction would be 809, thus showing that 225 persons are to be thrown out of employment over and above the unvarying rule of 20 per cent. adopted by the committee. In all the Departments there are 5,185 clerks and employés, and we find by this bill a reduction of about 1,400. Twenty per cent. of the total amount of the employés would be 1,036, thus showing that this bill proposes to throw out of employment 364 more persons than would be thrown out if the unvariable rule by which the committee has been governed had been carried out in the bill.

We find also that in the various Departments the number of employés whose salaries are not reduced by this bill is 1,802; the number whose salaries are reduced is 1,209. The percentage of reduction on the salaries of the number reduced is certainly more than 15 per cent.

What has really been the principle that has governed the committee in the matter of salaries in the preparation of this bill ? I undertake to say that the chairman has unintentionally misled the House in saying that he has followed an unvarying rule of reduction of 10 per cent. on the salaries. To the rule of the committee, as stated by the chairman, there are numerous exceptions. The committee has gone back to 1865, 1863, 1857, and 1855, and ascertained what the salaries were at these dates, and then deducted therefrom 10 per cent. Take many of the chiefs of divisions in the various Bureans of the Treasury Department, for instance, and in the War Department and other Departments, whose salaries within the last few years have been increased to $2,100 and $2,400, or thereabouts. We go back to 1865 and find that their salaries at that time were $2,000, and we have taken therefrom 10 per cent. That is the principle upon which the committee has acted, and that accounts for the very large percentage of reduction of salaries as shown by this table.

The chairman of the committee claims great credit for coming in here and putting his party, as he proposes to do, upon record for a reduction of 10 per cent. upon their own salaries. Why, sir, if the policy which this committee adopted in preparing this bill is carried out in regard to our own salaries, we must go back to 1865 and previous thereto and find out what our salaries then were, $3,000 each. If the majority desire to be consistent, take from this sum your 10 per cent. and then come into this House with your bill; you will then be consistent. I want to say that if the principles adopted in this bill are approved by the House I shall, if no other member does, move a reduction of 10 per cent. from $3,000, the salary as fixed when that of the clerks was fixed, from whose pay we now deduct 10 per cent. If this is done the committee can boast of a further reduction of nearly $700,000.

Curiously enough, I find that the salaries of the first, second, third, and fourth class clerks and of the two-thousand-dollar chiefs of divisions were fixed in 1855 and in 1857, in good old democratic times, when the cost of living in this city was certainly 33 per cent. less than it is to-day. Those salaries have come down to us through all these years. If they constitute an abuse, it is one that has been inherited from the democratic party. We to-day propose to make this reduction upon these salaries which were fixed in 1855 to 1865, and then go to the country claiming a great credit for reducing our own salaries 10 per cent! There is no consistency in this House, if the principle of this bill is adopted, unless we make our own salaries $2,700.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is an abuse, the mileage abuse, that ought to be corrected. I hope I do not violate the secrets of the committee-room when I say that the minority tried to remedy it, and we shall seek to remedy it in this House. There are members on this floor who receive more as mileage than other members of the House do as pay and mileage put together. One of the good results of the "salary-grab bill," and about the only thing there was in it that the people approved, was the removal of this mileage abuse. Now, the minority of the committee propose to substitute actual expenses for mileage, in lieu of the present vicious system of payment of

Now let us take up this matter a little in detail and see what the result is. I will take first the State Department. In that Department there are to-day one hundred and sixteen employés at an annual cost of $135,360. There are recommended in this bill seventy-six employés at an annual cost of $87,470, a reduction of forty in number, an annual cost of $47,890—a reduction not of 20 per cent. in numbers, but of 35 per cent., and 35 per cent. in cost. Now I undertake to say that if there is any Department of the Government that has the confidence of the country, it is the Department of State. Every gentleman who is acquainted with the workings of that Department will agree with me that it is carefully, economically, and prudently managed. I doubt not myself that reductions may be made there as elsewhere; but I want to say that neither the able head of that Department nor any one of his employés was ever consulted when this bill was being prepared. Up to this day not a single member of the committee has consulted with the Secretary of State upon this subject.

Take the Treasury Department. In the office of the Secretary of the Treasury there are employed to-day four hundred and eighty-four persons. The bill proposes to reduce the number to three hundred and seventy-seven, a reduction of one hundred and seven. But, to be entirely fair in getting at this percentage, I want to say that the committee, and especially my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] were very "sweet" upon the charwomen of that Department. The number of these has been ninety, and when the proposition was made to reduce that number, for some reason or other our friends on the other side opposed the reduction.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does my friend from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] mean to intimate that as to these old ladies employed to sweep out the Department he was in favor of reducing the number?

Mr. FOSTER. I was not.
Mr. HOLMAN. Then the gentleman from Ohio agreed with his colleagues on the committee in letting the old ladies hold their places.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.
Mr. HOLMAN. That is my recollection.
Mr. FOSTER. It is my recollection too. I remember, also, (as we have got into committee secrets a little,) that when the proposition was made to reduce the number of charwomen in the State Department from twenty to ten, I objected to it, but the gentleman from Indiana insisted upon the reduction. But, as I said, the gentleman from Indiana was "sweet" on the charwomen of the Treasury De-

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no recollection as to the charwomen of the State Department. My friend seems to have watched with great vigilance that portion of the bill relating to the ladies employed in the various Departments.

Mr. FOSTER. I only alluded to the course of the gentleman from Indiana on this subject—

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend should mention, however, that it is not the clerks of the Department he is speaking of, but the old ladies who at the close of office hours go into the Departments to sweep out the buildings.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.
Mr. HOLMAN. I will not say what transpired in the Committee on Appropriations; but I do not remember that my friend from Ohio was the champion of the charwomen of the State Department, though he may have been.

Mr. FOSTER. I gave the gentleman from Indiana the credit of being the champion of the charwomen of the Treasury Department. I simply wanted to say that, after deducting the charwomen, as to whom no reduction was made, the number at present employed is 354, and the force proposed in this bill, deducting the charwomen, is 287, the percentage of reduction being 26 per cent., not the "invariable rule" of 20 per cent.

Now, neither the Secretary of the Treasury nor any one of the employés of his Department was consulted while this bill was being prepared. He himself, in a commendable spirit, proposes reductions; but what do we do? To-day there are in the Secretary's Office ten chiefs of divisions. They are men surrounding the Secretary of the Treasury to whom are referred the various branches of business that have to be conducted in that office. They are his eyes, his ears, his judgment; men upon whom he must rely for facts and even for law. The number of these chiefs has been reduced to five. The Secretary of the Treasury says that he can reduce the number to eight, but that he cannot successfully run that Department with any less number.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after considerable examination of this Office, I want to say to the House that I believe it is the worst policy that can possibly be inaugurated to reduce below a proper number this class of officers or to diminish their pay. We throw upon the Secretary of the Treasury more work than one hundred men are physically able to perform. He must rely upon this class of employés for his judgment upon matters that come before him. A mistake on the part of these men, a want of integrity on their part, would in a single in-stance cause the loss of ten times all that we might save by the reduction of their salaries.

I would first secure for these places men of capability, men of integrity; and I would pay, as a business man always does under similar circumstances, the amount necessary to obtain them. The bill proposes to reduce these officers to five. The Secretary of the Treasury says he cannot run that Department with less than eight. This is the Secretary who of his own motion, in a part of the appropriations where he has discretion, has reduced the cost of the collection of your cus-It has discretion, has reduced the close of the concentral of your customs more than a million and a half of dollars. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am willing to take the judgment of that Secretary as to what his force ought to be. He meets us in a commendable spirit. He is willing to make certain reductions—a large reduction I might say. He may be willing to come down to 20 per cent.; but he cannot successfully run his Office with a reduction of 26 per cent. He speaks for himself in the following letter:

himself in the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 15, 1876.

Sir: I have the honor to invite your attention to the very large reduction, both in the number of employés and the compensation, of those to be retained in this Department, as proposed in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill reported to the House.

The business of the Treasury Department cannot properly be transacted with the force provided for in the bill, and I recommend that the Burcau officers of the Department be allowed to state their views to the committee as to the proposed reduction in their respective Offices.

Referring to the Secretary's Office, about which I can speak with more personal knowledge, I am positive in saying that it will be impossible to perform the duties imposed upon it by law with the number of officers, clerks, and employés allowed by the bill, which reduces the present number by one hundred and seven persons.

While the public business of the Secretary's office can be transacted more satisfactorily with ten chiefs of divisions, I am willing to undertake the task of getting along with eight divisions, and would suggest the consolidation of the divisions of loans and currency and the internal revenue and navigation divisions, leaving eight divisions with chiefs and eight assistant chiefs; and with a less number than this the public interests will suffer.

The present compensation of the chiefs of divisions is not a sufficient remuneration for the duties and responsibilities devolving upon them; but, appreciating the determination of the Committee on Appropriations and the House of Representatives to reduce salaries, I refrain from making any recommendations in that direction, but desire to invite your particular attention and that of the committee to the large and unequal discrimination in the bill against the assistant chiefs of divisions, whose compensation is proposed to be reduced $600 per annum each, while that of the chiefs is reduced but $300 each. I recommend that the salary of the the majority of the committee has adopted. Let us take the Comptrollers. There are four controlling officers among the Departments, the First and Second Comptroller, the Collector of Customs, and the Auditor for the Post-Office Department. Let us examine the reductions we make in these different Offices. The First Comptroller now has a force of 49 persons; we reduce the number to 39, a reduction of 20 per cent. The Second Comptroller has a force of 73 persons; we reduce the number to 48, a reduction of 34 per cent. in numbers and of 40 per cent. in cost. The Commissioner of Customs, another controlling officer, who controls the expenditures of as large sums as any one of the other officers, has 32 persons employed under him; we reduce the number to 21, a reduction of 34 per cent. in numbers and of 40 per cent. in cost. The Sixth Auditor has 243 persons employed under him; we have reduced the number to 226, a reduction of 7 per cent. in number and of 15 per cent. in cost.

There are some strange inequalities in this "unvarying rule" which he majority of the committee has adopted. Let us take the Comp-

Now I cannot understand why these discrepancies exist. There is another and remarkable feature about this matter. In the First Comptroller's Office the deputy formerly known under the name of chief clerk received $2,000 a year until changed to $2,800 by the Kellogs bill last year, a salary fixed, I think, in 1857, and which was never raised, except upon the percentage paid in 1867 or 1868, until raised by the Kellogg bill, as above. We propose in this bill to reduce his salary 7½ per cent., a reduction of $200. So with the Second Comptroller. But we take the deputy comptroller of the Currency by the troller. But we take the deputy comptroller of the Currency by the nape of the neck and reduce his salary from $3,000 to $2,250, a reduction of 25 per cent.

The deputy commissioner of customs is paid \$2,250, a reduction of 10 per cent. The deputy comptroller, as before stated, receives \$2,600. The duties of one are certainly as arduous as those of the others. We can take most of these chiefs of divisions and put them back to where they were in 1865 and take from their pay 10 per cent. But here is a certain class, one or two persons, from whom we only take  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. from \$2,800, when their salaries previously had been only \$2,000.

Take the Comptroller of the Currency. His force is reduced 32 per cent. and 36 per cent. in salaries. The Comptroller states to us that he cannot possibly run his Department with the force we give him, and he makes this statement in a letter to my colleague on the committee from New York, [Mr. Wheeler.] His letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

nim, and he makes this statement in a letter to my colleague on the committee from New York, [Mr. Wheeler.] His letter is as follows:

Theasury Department,

Office of Comptioller of the Current,

Washington, February 23, 1576.

Sir: In accordance with your verbal request I inclose herewith the tables desired by you; also, a statement showing the amount of bank-notes which have been received from the engravers and issued to the national banks, and the amount of national-bank notes which have been received and destroyed since the passage of the act of June 20, 1874. From this statement it will be seen that $191,3346.20 of mutilated notes have been returned to this Office, counted, and destroyed during that period. The amount of national-bank notes received from the engravers during the same time was $241,332,587 and the amount issued to the banks $188,266,529, making an aggregate of $623,983,736 which has passed through the hauds of the employes in this Office during the last nineteen months, or an average of more than $32,800,000 of currency monthly—a larger amount it is believed than has been received and issued by any Office in the Treasury Department, and a much larger amount of bank-notes than has ever before been counted and issued in any country during the same period of time. The average amount of national-bank notes contained in the vaults of this Office during the present fiscal year is more than $70,000,000, and the amount held at the present time is more than $80,000,000. No losses whatever have occurred in the transaction of this immense volume of business, and no complaints have been made, so far as I am aware, by any of the twenty-two hundred national banks, or other correspondents, of incompetency or fraud.

The Comptroller gives a bond of $100,000 for the faithful performance of his duty and the deputy one of $50,000. None of the other employees of the Office are required to give bonds. The responsibility for these large sums of money is of necessity delegated, in a great measure, to the chiefs o

The business of this Office, unlike that of many of the Offices of the Treasury Department, is continually increasing, and will, under the present system, continue to increase during the next fiscal year. The amount of national-bank notes to be permanently retired and the amount of bonds to be surrendered will undoubtedly be much greater during the next fiscal year than during the last.

The general depression of business throughout the country, and the consequent financial failures, make it more necessary than ever that the reports of the banks should be carefully examined. The consequent amount of correspondence is therefore greatly increased. The business of the Office is conducted upon the principle of a well-managed bank, and all letters are, as a rule, answered upon the day of their receipt.

of a well-managed bank, and all letters are, as a rule, answered upon the day of their receipt.

The amount of additional force estimated for the last year has proved to be somewhat larger than is necessary, and on this account a number of the employés have been occupied elsewhere in the performance of duty. The number of clerks of the lower grades may therefore be somewhat diminished, and I propose a reduction of nineteen employés: making a reduction of $18,700.

The chiefs of divisions, the stenographer, and many of the other clerks have been employed in this Office for many years. Their predecessors have been induced by higher compensation to accept positions of trust in other places. Bank officers in this city and elsewhere, whose responsibility is far less than that of those holding similar positions in this Office, receive far greater compensation; and I therefore urgently request that no other deductions be made from the estimates of this Office than those named herein.

Very respectfully,

JNO. JAY KNOX, Comptroller.

Hon. WILLIAM A. WHEELER, House of Representatives.

bill proposes to give him $1,531,000, a difference of $620,000. It is proper to add that the Department has consolidated the collection districts in the country to one hundred and sixty-five, and proposes to consolidate them further, down to one hundred and twenty-nine; and that by this consolidation, if carried out by Congress, they can reduce the cost of making this collection to $1,900,000. The bill proposes to reduce the number of the collection districts to one hundred and five.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have always favored the consolidation of the collection districts to the utmost extent practicable, but I must in this matter be governed somewhat by the able gentleman who presides over that Bureau, and his corps of able assistants. They claim if this reduction is made, as proposed in this bill, it will be impossible to collect the revenues of the country. I give it as my opinion, let it be worth what it may, that it is impossible to successfully collect the revenues of the country on the appropriation here made. I hold in my hand a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which contains his protest against this proposed reduction of collection districts to one hundred and five, which I ask to be printed with my remarks:

printed with my femarks:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, February 26, 1876.

SIE: Referring to the amount asked for the "salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue" for fiscal year 1877, I have the honor to state that the original estimate of $2,151,000 for this service submitted by the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury was conscientiously made upon the basis of the machinery of collection as then duly constituted. It was considered as so near the amount that would probably be actually expended, as to lead to the adoption of a plan of consolidation, which had received much consideration for a considerable period of time, and was the result of much special examination with direct reference thereto, and had also been the subject of many reports to this Office by its agents in different sections of the country.

which had received much consideration for a considerable period of time, and was the result of much special examination with direct reference thereto, and had also been the subject of many reports to this Office by its agents in different sections of the country.

This Office moved slowly in the matter, because of its desire not to allow its earnest wish for economical administration to cripple in any degree the efficiency of the service, or render the enforcement of the internal-revenue laws less thorough and uniform throughout the Union.

There are many circumstances incident to the collection of the revenue in each district that should be fully considered before a decision of the question whether that district could, be judiciously consolidated with other districts without detriment to the service.

This Office from the very nature of things is practically familiar with all such considerations, and by reason of its experience in dealing with such questions and its practical knowledge of the necessities of the service in each district, as well as of the persons upon whom will probably devolve the duty of collecting the revenue in the territory covered by the districts proposed to be consolidated, should be better qualified than any other branch of the Government to advise judiciously adiated intelligently concerning what consolidations, if any, should be made.

The consolidations made as above stated, and which took effect on various dates from December 10, 1875, to February 1, 1876, were as numerous as this Office felt warranted in recommending. It was deemed better to wait and see how these recent consolidations were going to work, and to make further consolidations as fast as experience and other circumstances should render them advisable.

This Office was met by your committee with a proposition on make a reduction in the number of districts from one hundred and sixty-six, the present number, to one hundred and five, thus abolishing sixty-one districts. It has given to this proposition that degree of atte

Another consideration which has weight with this Office is that anything which tends to cause delay in the filing here of the accounts of collectors or which tends to lengthen the time before acts of collectors or their deputics are passed upon by this Office tends to weaken its control over them and to reduce its chances of promptly detecting defalcations and its ability of taking prompt steps to protect the interests of the United States as well as of the tax-payers. This is so because an increase in the area of the territory in the district of a collector increases the time required to obtain the reports from his deputies which are necessary to enable him to make to this Office his reports for the entire district. The check of the collector and is deputies is thus seriously diminished and the liability to loss through them much increased. This delay makes the reports of the collector later in arriving at the Department, and gives him, if so disposed, more time in which to conceal his missioings or in which to escape arrest and punishment if necessary.

As the result is time seen to be to diminish the rigor of the check of this Office upon collectors, and also that of the latter upon deputy collectors, it is easy to see the property of the collector of the collectors and the collectors of the collectors and the collectors of the collectors and the collectors of the collectors of the service, the di

Hon. S. J. Randall, Chairman Appropriation Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I certify that the above is a true copy of original letter, press copy of which is on file in this Office.

D. D. PRATT, Commissioner Internal Revenue.

The next estimate for appropriation on account of internal revenue is for salaries, expenses, and fees of supervisors, agents, surveyors, gaugers, store-keepers, and miscellaneous expenses, $2,300,000. The bill proposes for this purpose $1,450,000. These estimates can be reduced $50,000 on account of the reduction proposed in the bill for the pay of gaugers. It can be reduced $139,000 more on account of the abolishment of the office of supervisor, which the Commissioner agrees to, but only on condition that he is supplied with an increased force of superial agents. A difference may be made of $200,000 sioner agrees to, but only on condition that he is supplied with an increased force of special agents. A difference may be made of $200,000 by the change of gauging, as recommended by the Commissioner; so that a total of about $350,000 may be properly reduced from the sum recommended by the Department—$2,300,000. But the Department says, and it is my own judgment after careful investigation, that it is utterly impossible, utterly unsafe, and will jeopardize to a great degree the collection of revenue if we make the reduction as proposed by this bill. The committee will testify with me to the generous manner in which it was met by Mr. Pratt and his subordinates. They met us in a spirit of economy and reform in every respect. They erous manner in which it was met by Mr. Pratt and his subordinates. They met us in a spirit of economy and reform in every respect. They proposed of themselves every possible reduction that could be made consistent with the safe working of that Department. They agreed to a 20 per cent. reduction of their force. But instead of that, we make it 25 per cent. They say to us that they cannot possibly run that Department successfully on the force that we propose to give them, and I propose to take their word.

Now, take the Interior Department, if you please. What is amazing to me in the examination of this Department is to find that the salaries generally speaking in the Interior Department have not salaries, generally speaking, in the Interior Department have not been increased in the last fifteen years. There are surrounding the Secretary of the Interior eight clerks who to-day are receiving $2,000 a year each. They are to that Secretary what the chiefs of divisions in the Office of the Secretary of the Treasury are to him. They are his eyes and his ears and his judgment. To the Secretary of the Inhis eyes and his ears and his judgment. To the Secretary of the Interior is referred more labor than fifty men have the physical capacity to perform, and he must rely upon his chiefs of divisions for advice and coansel. One of these chiefs is disbursing officer, and disburses $4,000,000 annually. He gives a bond of $80,000 and supervises the appropriations for the entire Department, drawing his warrants therefor. And yet he receives but $2,000 to-day, and we propose by this bill to reduce his salary 10 per cent. I say for this Department what I said for the Secretary of the Treasury: I would increase rather than diminish the salaries of these important chiefs about that Secretary than diminish the salaries of these important chiefs about that Secretary. There is no business interest in this country that employs the talent possessed by these clerks for the sum that is paid them.

Take the Commissioner of the Land Office. We reduce his force about 20 per cent.; and yet there is a law upon your statute-books to-day compelling him to make an index of the records there; and I want to say to this House, what may be a surprise to them: there is no index in that Office, and cannot be, for the reason that Congress has never yet made a sufficient appropriation to make it.

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be no objection to the extension

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be no objection to the extension of the time of the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman's time will be extended. For how long?

Mr. FOSTER. Only for five or ten minutes.

There was no objection, and Mr. FOSTER's time was extended.

Mr. FOSTER. This Office to-day has not not even a deputy commissioner, and yet it is a court, so to speak, adjudicating upon more value than the Supreme Court of the United States. Yet we take that Department where the force ought to be increased, and we reduce it 20 per cent., reducing the salaries also of the chief officers in that Department.

The percentage of high-grade clerks in this Office is much less than any other Bureau of the Government, being but 1½ per cent., while all the rest run much higher.

I hold in my hand a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office protesting against the reduction in his Office, which I will incorporate in my remarks.

Department of the Interior, General Land Office,

Washington, D. C., Margh 14, 1876.

Sir.: Referring to that portion of bill H R. No. 2571, pages 52 and 53, making appropriations for the service of this Office, I desire to call your attention to the following points:

This bill fails to contain the provise of similar bills of previous sessions vesting in the Secretary of the Interior a discretionary power by which this Office was supplied with "copyists" (see United States Statutes at Large, volume 18, page 364) in the following language: "Provided that the Secretary of the Interior, at his discretion, shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to use any portion of said appropriation for piece-work, or by the day, month, or year, at such rate or rates as he may deem just and fair, not exceeding a salary of $1,200 per annum;" and also fails to provide specifically for that class of clerks.

Consequently, under the provisicns of bill 2571 as it now stands, this Office will at the end of the current fiscal year be deprived of its entire corps of copyists. The result must necessarily be an entire suspension of one class of work and the serious obstruction of several other classes.

The public at large has been notified by my official report. (1875, page 21.) and to a still greater extent by the widespread announcement of the newspaper press, reported from time to time during the past six months, that this Office was engaged in collating the patents remaining on file here and at the several local offices with a view to the delivery of the same to the present holders of the lands.

The sum of this class of patents will comprise from one to two millions, of which there are some 30,000 cases in the State of Ohio; 60,000 cases in Indiana, and 120,000 to 150,000 cases in Illinois, with still larger numbers in Iowa, Missouri, California, &c.

The land-owners in these States, stimulated by the pre-announcement of the purpose of this Office, are aroused to a natural sense of the importance of securing these foundation titles to their possessions, and the correspondence of the Office abundantly shows that they are impatiently awaiting the completion and publication of the lists.

the lists.

At the present rate of progress in the work I shall be ready to deliver the patents for the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois within six or seven months. Deprived of my corps of copyists, my ability to complete or even continue the work after June 30 next will cease entirely.

The proposed reduction of this particular class of employés will also still further postpone the performance of a labor imposed upon this Office by a law which has stood upon the statute-books for forty years, namely, the indexing of the records of patents, now comprising three millions and a half. This labor is required by the act of July 4, 1836; but through insufficiency of clerical force it has never yet been even commenced.

stood upon the statute-books for forty years, namely, the indexing of the records of patents, now comprising three millions and a half. This labor is required by the act of July 4, 1836; but through insufficiency of clerical force it has never yet been even commenced.

In view of these facts, I have the honor to recommend that line 1265 of bill H. R. 2571 be amended by substituting "ninety-six" for "eighty;" and that the proviso hereinbefore recited (pages 1 and 2 of this letter) be added to line 1270.

Upon the matter of the proposed allowance of salary for one draughtsman and one assistant draughtsman under the pending bill. I beg to state that the sum of $1.400, fixed as the salary of the draughtsman for the ensuing fiscal year, is not sufficient to retain in the service of the Government a person competent to discharge the duties of that place. Not only should the principal draughtsman be conversant fully and thoroughly with the details, practical and theoretical, of the general surveying system of the United States and with the large body of laws controlling the same, but he should be competent as well to test the accuracy of the work and supervise the intricate computations which have to do with the surveys astronomically made of the boundary-lines which from time to time are established under authority of law, and which for all future time are to separate the jurisdictions of the Territories of the United States and of the States hereafter to be created therefrom. In other words, every motive of public economy, safety, and accuracy requires that the principal draughtsman of this Office should be a man of the bigbest scientific attainments in his profession. Such a man, I repeat, cannot be obtained at the salary proposed to be paid.

In my opinion a salary of $1,400.

I deem itmy duty to further call your attention to the following special matters: In the appropriation for the current year; on the contrary, a clerk at that salary had long been provided for by law, although under a different designation.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

s. S. BURDETT, Commissioner.

Hon. Samuel J. Randall,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

The only offices graded as low as the General Land Office are the Adjutant-General's, Quartermaster-General's, Surgeon-General's, and Peusion Offices.

We take the Commissioner of Pensions, who receives to-day $3,000 a year, and reduce his pay to $2,700. I suppose I am telling no secret when I say that the present Commissioner of Pensions has tendered his resignation, refusing to remain in that office even at the three-thousand-dollar salary; and yet we propose to reduce the salary of this important officer, who has the charge of payments to the soldiers of this country of twenty-nine and a half millions of dollars—whe propose to reduce his pay $300.

While I have taken up some Departments of the Government and some of the Bureau officers, it would be nothing more than fair for me to make a statement as to the number of employés that are proposed for this House.

The present force of the Clerk's office is sixty-one; this bill proposes to reduce it to thirty-nine, a reduction of 36 per cent. While this bill takes twenty-two men out of the Clerk's office of the House, it only takes four men out of the Clerk's office of the Senate. The it only takes four men out of the Clerk's office of the Senate. The Clerk of the House is charged with the execution of various duties which in the Senate are performed by the Sergeant-at-Arms; for example, the heating and ventilating department, the Clerk's document room, the telegraph operator and messenger, which in the House are placed under the direction and control of the Clerk, are all in the Senate placed under the direction and control of the Sergeant-at-Arms. If the number of men performing these duties, which in the Arms. If the number of men performing these duties, which in the Senate are performed by persons on the roll of the Sergeant-at-Arms, be deducted from the Clerk's force, it leaves the Clerk of the House, composed of three hundred and two members, a force of thirty-one, while it gives the Secretary of the Senate, composed of only ninety-four members, a force of twenty-six for the performance of similar duties for that body, or a difference of only five men in the Clerk's office of the two bodies, the one composed of three hundred and two members and the other composed of only seventy-four members. Of course the layers the leaves the days the greater the wants of its members and course the larger the body the greater the wants of its members and the greater the force necessary to perform the duties of any office. If any proof were necessary on this point we have only to compare the amount of business done in the House in any given Congress with that done in the Senate. Take the Forty-third Congress for example.

	nced in the House.
Bills and jo	s of bills introduced in House	1,025
Exces	s passed by House	703

The Journal of the House for the same Congress is three times as large as the Journal of the Senate.

But again. In the Thirty-eighth Congress the force in the Clerk's office was fifty. The House had one hundred and ninety-six members, while the present House has three hundred and two members. The business and labor of the Clerk's office have increased in a much larger proportion than this increase in membership.

For example, take the number of bills and joint resolutions introduced then and now:

In the Thirty-eighth Congress 995 In the Forty-third Congress 5,053

Take the petitions and memorials introduced then and now. the Thirty-eighth Congress those introduced filled in the file-clerk's room twenty-five boxes; those introduced in the Forty-third Congress filled two hundred and thirty-eight boxes.

Take the Journal of the House then and now. The Journal of the first session of the Thirty-eighth Congress has 1163 pages; of the Forty-third Congress has 1766 pages. And so in every branch and desk of the Clerk's office has the labor of the office increased correspondingly.

Spondingly.

Yet, notwithstanding this large increase in the business and labor of the office, it is now proposed by this bill to give the Clerk of the House composed of three hundred and two members a force of thirtynine, while the force required for the Thirty-eighth Congress composed of only one hundred and ninety-six members was fifty.

The table which I hold in my hand showing the reductions in the Clerk's office will be printed with my remarks.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after a great deal of investigation of this subject, I give it as my opinion that a reduction of 20 per cent. of the number of employes can be made if judiciously done. I stand upon that. But I do not believe that upon the reduction as made by the bill it will be possible to run these Departments successfully.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman a question if he will permit me.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I would like to know from the gentleman what is the reason that the clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means the mest important committee in the House is put Ways and Means, the most important committee in the House, is put down to $2,250, while the salary of the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations is put at $2,400.

Mr. FOSTER. I would prefer that the gentleman should ask that question of my friend the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] Mr. HOLMAN. And I would like my friend from Ohio to answer the question thus: That the clerk, as is well known to every gentleman in the House, including the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the clerk upon whom devolves the most laborious duties in this House, requiring the largest range of experience of all the clerks of the House, is the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations; and that for that reason, and that only, this discrimination was made.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I always understood that the Committee on Ways and Means was the most important committee of the House and has heretofore been, and if the tariff bill comes up, as it is likely to do, the clerk of that committee will have more duties to perform than the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN Litrust my friend will allow me to say here that

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my friend will allow me to say here that on any one of the great appropriation bills of the House, any one of them, the amount of labor required to be performed, the range of in-telligent information required to be possessed by the clerk, is to a much greater extent than is required by the clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means in reference to the measures that generally come up before that committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. It did not use to be so.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I observe that the salary of Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I observe that the salary of the deputy first comptroller is cut down only 7 per cent., while the deputy comptroller of the currency is cut down 25 per cent. I would like the gentleman from Ohio to tell me the reason for that.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I can hardly answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I know that the deputy first comptroller is reduced only 7½ per cent. and that the deputy comptroller of the currency is reduced 25 per cent.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to answer the question.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the question? Will the gentleman repeat it?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. What is the reason that the deputy first comptroller is only reduced $200, or 71 per cent., while the Comptroller of the Currency, who has to render large security, is reduced from $3,000 to $2,250, or 25 per cent.? I desire to know the reason or principle which induced the committee to make that dis-reason or principle which induced the committee to make that distinction between the two deputy comptrollers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will try to state the principle on which it was done. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will not state that the relative salaries, the relation of those salaries, is not reasonable as they stand now. If the gentleman assumes, as was stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] that this reduction of salaries has been upon a given per cent., a uniform one, then the question put by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a very proper one; but that was only gentleman from Pennsylvania is a very proper one; but that was only a very general rule and there are multitudes of exceptions to it in the bill. My friend will observe that those exceptions grow out of the results of our legislation from year to year on the subject of salaries partly, resulting from the running up of a given salary in an appropriation bill. In this manner these inequalities have increased from year to year; so that if the gentleman asks me why one salary is reduced only 7½ per cent. and another is reduced 25 per cent., I will simply say that the reduction was made for the purpose of getting some reasonable harmony in salaries. My friend will not say that the salaries of these Comptrollers are disproportioned at all.

Mr. FOSTER. Allow me to say that the salary of the deputy first comptroller was raised last year while that of the deputy comptroller of the currency had stood I think at $2,500 for a number of years. We only reduced it 7½ per cent., and that may be right; I do not know about it.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman sets out with the proposition that Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman sets out with the proposition that salaries are all to be reduced on a dead level and a given per cent., then he would find inequalities all through this bill. If he inquires whether salaries are reasonable in themselves or bear proper relation to one another, then I am willing to answer his questions.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I am trying to find out the principle on which the committee acted.

Mr. HOLMAN. The principle has been to fix reasonable salaries. You would be certain to make unreasonable salaries if you reduce them by a given per cent., because inequalities exist through the action of Congress in increasing particular salaries on appropriation bills. Why, only last year the salaries of a whole group of officers were thrown up beyond the proper proportion as regards their salaries.

Mr. FOSTER. That is all very well; but the chairman of the committee told the House that we had adopted an invariable rule.

Mr. HOLMAN. O! my friend from Ohio certainly misquotes the

Mr. HOLMAN. O! my friend from Ohio certainly misquotes the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. O! no; I had it read only a few minutes ago.
Mr. HOLMAN. That was only a general principle.
Mr. FOSTER. The general principle in making the bill was a run and a jump, in my judgment.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend had as much to do with it as any other gentleman of the committee, and has generally concurred in the principles of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. O, no!
Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I desire to inquire from the gentleman from Indiana whether the deputy first comptroller gives any security for the performance of his duties.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think not; I believe the law does not require him to do so.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Did I not understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] to say that the Comptroller of the Currency has to give $50,000 security?

Mr. FOSTER. I believe so.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Then the salary of the deputy first comptroller is reduced from $2,800 to $2,600, giving no security, and the deputy comptroller of the currency from $3,000 to $2,250, and has to give $55,000 security. and has to give $25,000 security.

I desire to ask another question from the gentleman from Indiana, and it is whether or not the first deputy comptroller, whose salary is only reduced $200, is a democrat?

Mr. HOLMAN. The first deputy comptroller?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I really do not know what gentleman holds the office, and I should not regard it a very elevated view of questions of salary to determine them upon the politics of the gentleman who may happen to hold the office.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I agree to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have not gone into that detail.
Mr. FOSTER. Now I want to call attention to one other item in this bill; that is, the appropriations for public buildings and grounds in this District. It will be seen that by this bill very small appropriations are made for this purpose. I want to enter my protest against the action of the Committee on Appropriations in this particular. It throws out of employment

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend allow me a moment?

Mr. FOSTER. Let me finish this sentence. It throws out of employment a very large number of laboring people, and it will prevent the maintenance of the present beautiful squares and plots of ground in this city. I do not know what the purpose of my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] or of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. RANDALL] or of the committee itself is in this reduction. But [Mr. RANDALL,] or of the committee itself is in this reduction. But if they want to extend their economy in this direction, they might rent they want to extend their economy in this direction, they might rent these plots of ground for cow-pastures, and thus increase the revenues of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Townsend,] who has asked so extraordinary a question, almost equal to that asked by Mrs. Toby of her husband on a very interesting occasion.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me finish my speech.
Mr. HOLMAN. Just a moment. By this bill the salary of the first Comptroller of the Treasury is $4,500, and of the deputy first comptroller $2,600; the salary of the Second Comptroller is $4,500, and of the deputy second comptroller is $2,600. Now, which of these deputy comptrollers, each receiving the same salary, does my friend think has been discriminated for or against because he is a democrat?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I was inquiring concerning

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Fennsylvania. I was inquiring concerning the deputy first comptroller.

Mr. HOLMAN. His salary is fixed by this bill at $2,600.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. And the salary of the deputy second comptroller is

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Yes.
Mr. HOLMAN. Concerning the politics of which one does the gentleman inquire?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I would like to know the politics of both. Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman knows very well that it is the custom of this Administration to retain many officers, such as deputy comptrollers, who differ in opinion with the Administration?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I think, if my friend will inquire to-morrow of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations,

Mr. HOLMAN. And the deputy first comptroller is a democrat.

Mr. HOLMAN. And the deputy second comptroller also?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I do not know.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the opinion of my friend on that point?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I have no opinion, for I do not know

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend must see that the two deputy comptrollers receive by this bill exactly the same salary, $2,600, and the two Comptrollers receive $4,500 each. The salary of the two deputy comptrollers is reduced $200 each and of the two Comptrollers $500 each. Does my friend see in that any evidence of discrimination in favor of or against any man on account of his politics?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot yield further. I have but this additional to say: Following the safe precedents established by the republican party, I repeat that the minority place themselves squarely in the line of retrenchment and reform, and will deliberate on the bill before us in a strictly non-partisan manner, regarding the questions presented simply as business propositions to be determined upon business principles.

The CHAIRMAN.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Scales] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few

Mr. SCALES. Certainly, I will do so.
Mr. HOLMAN. While the general temper of the speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, is reasonable and fair, there seems to me to be an unreasonable disposition on his part to create an impression against this bill, such as I think a member of the committee that reported it should not seek to create. Indeed the remarks of the gentleman from should not seek to create. Indeed the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio sounded to me very much like the remarkable suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Townsend,] that this bill is in some degree, in some of its features, an outgrowth not of the public interest, but of a desire to promote partisan interests.

Now, what can be more unjust than to raise a question of a political character in regard to one of these deputy comptrollers, admitting that characterin regard to one of these deputy comptrollers, admitting that one of them is a democrat and the other a republican, when the fact is apparent to every member on this floor that their salaries are fixed at exactly the same sum, $2,600 each? Now, if the object of calling attention to this is to induce gentlemen on that side of the House to oppose this attempt to reduce the expenditures of the Government, we will have to accept it in the spirit in which it is made. But I really trust that the action of this House on this bill, the first important appropriation bill of this session which seeks to reduce expenditures, will not be approached by gentlemen upon the republican side of the House in the spirit thus indicated.

And I would say further, and I say it with great pleasure, that the members of the minority of the Committee on Appropriations have not exhibited any desire to throw obstacles in the way of a reasona-ble retrenchment of the expenditures of the Government. And some of the members of that committee, representing the minority of this House, have gone to the full length with the majority in their desire to reduce the expenditures of this Government to the extent that they are affected by the provisions of this bill.

When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] seeks to impress upon this House the fact that the reduction of salaries proposed by this bill is made upon a positive scale of reduction, by a given percentage, and then predicates an argument against the bill that in some instances the reduction is more than that percentage and in some instances it is less, he does himself great injustice.

It is injustice to members of that committee, all of them; for the gentleman from Ohio well knows that while the general proposition was that the salaries should be reduced 10 per cent. and the force of employés 20 per cent., it was impossible in the nature of things to adhere to any such unvarying rule. In many instances salaries are reduced much more than 10 per cent, and the force of employés much more than 20 per cent., depending on the judgment the committee was able to form as to what was necessary for the public service, and

But, sir, whatever view may be taken of this bill by this side of the House or by the other side of the House, one thing is true, and I call upon the gentleman from Ohio, who hears me make the statement, to say whether he cannot confirm it, that the Committee on Appropriations in framing this bill, one of the most complicated which will priations in framing this bill, one of the most complicated which will come before the House in the way of appropriations, had but one object in view, and that was simply to reduce the appropriations to what was necessary and proper to be made for each Department—only to the extent required by the public service and not beyond it. He will agree that with an eye single to that object alone the labors of the last two months have been employed by that committee I think that I may say that neither personal nor partisan considerations have been displayed in the action of that committee on any one occasion. I will say further that I think there is not one reduction made sion. I will say further that I think there is not one reduction made by this bill in the proposed reduction of these millions when at least some members representing the minority of the committee and the minority of the House have not given the measure cordial and earnest

My friend shakes his head; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Townsend,] after raising the question as to whether, when you put two deputy comptrollers on exactly the same footing at salaries of $2,600 each, it does not tend to establish the proposition that some favoritism was shown in behalf of one department occupied by democrats, has not thought proper to notice other portions of the bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania as well as my friend from Ohio should bear in mind that there is one branch of the Government, this House of Representatives, with its army of employés, which stands upon a somewhat different footing politically from the other departments of the Government. I should like to have the gentleman from Ohio rise up and answer the question whether the Committee on Appropriations in making appropriations for this House of Representatives, where its friends are involved, where their number and pay are involved, made any attempt to discriminate in their favor as compared with the reduction of salaries and number of employés in the other branches of the Government? Mr. FOSTER. As the gentleman from Indiana well knows, I have already to-day in my speech made the statement that you have discriminated too much against this House, that you have reduced the number of its employes too much. The gentleman also well knows that the tenor of my speech favors reduction and that the action of the minority of the committee has been in favor of a general reduction of 20 per cent. My purpose was to call attention to discrepancies in the bill and to places where we could not go along with the committee, and particularly to show—

Mr. SCALES. I yielded the floor with the understanding that this was not to come out of my time.

was not to come out or my time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. I wished to show particularly to that side of the House that, if the principle of reduction of clerk's salaries was to be maintained, as a matter of consistency it was the duty of the House to reduce the pay of members to $2,700 a year.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to be heard for a moment on that question.

Now, to illustrate the principle upon which this bill is largely framed, I will take the two Comptrollers, the First and Second Comptrollers, and the deputy comptrollers of the Treasury Department. The salaries of the First and Second Comptrollers have been raised to $5,000 each. The deputy comptrollers were provided by an act of the last session of Congress with a salary of $2,800 each. It was thought proper to reduce the salary of the Comptrollers to $4,500 each. I think no gentleman will say that is an unreasonably low salary; on the contrary, most gentlemen will say that salary might be safely still further reduced. The deputy comptroller in the main is as important an officer as the Comptroller himself, and generally performs the larger portion of the service of his particular office. His salary is put at $2,600. I do not think that is unreasonable. The gentleman from Ohio cannot complain of that, nor will the gentleman from Pennsylvania who is so eager to make a point against the bill say those reductions are unreasonable.

They are important offices, I know; but what is the use of talking about a bond? There is no liability under that bond, if the officer brings integrity and reasonable vigilance to the performance of his It seems to be the fixed policy on the part of the Government to relieve an officer from the embezzlement of his subordinate, and the giving of a bond cannot be urged as a reason for high salary, for the officer incurs no liability under it if he be an honest and compe-the officer man. Honesty, competency, vigilance, and good faith in the public service are all the qualities required.

My friend says that the committee have gone back prior to the fixing of salaries last year, and to a period so remote as 1865 and 1867, and have even gone back as far as the year 1853 to get the data upon which there exists a period so remote as 1865 and 1867, and have even gone back as far as the year 1853 to get the data upon which these salaries should be reduced.

Now, does not my friend know that those are exceptional cases only? For the salaries were disproportionately high for the importance of the offices, and have been from time to time reduced in the course of events. And does he not know another thing, that he cannot safely say that the salaries that were established in this Government prior to 1860 were reasonable salaries, not too high? I want the gentleman to say that they were too low or that they were just right. The gentleman objects to the reduction of salaries that existed under demographs. eratic administration. Does he say that all the salaries as they stood when his party came into power were fair and reasonable salaries, neither too high nor too low?

Mr. FOSTER. I made no criticism on that point at all. I presumed that they were not too high. But the gentleman says that these are exceptional cases. Does he not know that the salaries of the first, second, third, and fourth class clerks were fixed prior to 1860 by the democratic party, and that these are the clerks that run through all the Departments ?

Mr. HOLMAN. And you say they are too high?

Mr. FOSTER. I did not make any such statement. I do not say either that they are too high or that they are too low. I merely made the statement to support my argument that if a reduction is made in these salaries as fixed in 1855 under democratic administration, when our salaries were $3,000, it would be fair that we should take a proportionate percentage off our own salaries. Does the gentleman favor that proposition?

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood the gentleman to say—
Mr. FOSTER. Will you answer my question? Do you favor that eduction?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am coming to that.
Mr. FOSTER. I should like an answer to that question.
Mr. HOLMAN. I shall not escape it or forget it. I under

I shall not escape it or forget it. I understood the entleman to say that he thought the salaries prior to 1860 were too high. Yet, although I have been here for a considerable number of years, I cannot remember when that side of the House denounced existing salaries as too high to be tolerated and demanded their re-

Mr. FOSTER. That was the gentleman's position then.
Mr. HOLMAN. I agreed fully with the gentleman; and I shall appeal to the record of eighteen years ago as a record of history on that very subject.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the position of the gentleman's party at that time?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman opens a field for me now. [Laughter.] My party was exactly in the position of my friend's party now; exactly so. Not so earnest, not so resolute perhaps in insisting on high salaries, but at the same time inclined to apologize for the salaries as they stood. But I do not remember in that olden time to salaries as they stood. But I do not remember in that orden time to have heard any gentleman stand upon the floor of the House and deliberately vindicate high salaries as the true policy of a republican government. I do not remember of such an instance. No! No!

Mr. FOSTER. The only instance I can remember during my service in the House of any gentleman on either side advocating high salaries.

ries is that of the present chairman of this very Committee on Appropriations

Mr. HOLMAN. He is absent now.
Mr. FOSTER. I mention that on account of his late conversion.
Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman ought to remember that the chairman of the committee is not present in the House. The measure to which he refers was carried.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Will my friend yield to me a

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.
Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I wish to refresh his recollec-He must remember when a distinguished gentleman of the democratic party sitting down there right at the corner beside where the gentleman is now speaking advocated $100,000 as the salary of the President of the United States and $10,000 as the salary of a member of Congre

Mr. HOLMAN. I am surprised at the gentleman from Pennsylvania almost as much as at my friend from Ohio assailing men who are not now present.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman does not consider that I am assailing any one.

Mr. HOLMAN. They are endeavoring to make points on gentle-ten who are not here in the House. You came into power, as the men who are not here in the House. whole country knows, upon the assumption that the democratic party prior to 1860 had become extravagant in the expenditures from the Treasury of this nation. You acquired power on the cry of retrenchment and reform.

Mr. FOSTER. O, no. Mr. HOLMAN. That That is the fact; and yet unhappily, when it is

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the lact; and yet unnapply, when it is now attempted to make a reform in that respect, gentleman on the other side argue strenuously against it being done.

The salaries were too high prior to 1860, and yet there is scarcely a salary reduced by this bill below the salaries of 1860. These other salaries have grown up since that time under the ruling of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Blaine,] who, I see, is honoring me with his attention, that he was compelled to construe the rule—and I never heard that construction before during fifteen years, but it had grown up and become the law of the House—that an amendment to an appropriation bill enlarging a salary was in order, but one reducing a salary—not reducing an appropriation, but reducing a salary—was

Mr. BLAINE. Does the gentleman from Indiana mean to say that that was a decision made by me?

Mr. HOLMAN. I say the gentleman from Maine was compelled

Mr. BLAINE. Why was I compelled to rule so?
Mr. HOLMAN. Because it was the law of the House.
Mr. BLAINE. It was a democratic construction of the rule which had obtained for more than twenty years; it was res adjudicata.
Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Did the gentleman from Maine ever take any means to change the rule?
Mr. BLAINE. Did the gentleman from New Jersey ever do the same? [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. It was for you to do it who had the control of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think the gentleman from Maine should pretend to defend himself in that way.

Mr. BLAINE. I have nothing to defend.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman hear me?

Mr. BLAINE. With pleasure.

Mr. HOLMAN. It does not comport with his usual fairness. During the leaf of the leaf of the leaf.

Mr. HOLMAN. It does not comport with his usual fairness. During the whole of the last Congress he was a member of the Committee on Rules, and the same rule that we have adopted and were compelled to adopt in the interests of the Government, which enables you to reduce salaries on appropriation bills, was before the same committee of the last House. My friend knew the embarrassment occasioned by the existing rule, but he was compelled to rule against any other construction because it was contrary to the law of the House of Representatives. But the ground of complaint is that when this same rule was before his committee in the last Congress, by the adoption of which there might have been a great reduction of ex-penses, under a heavy burden of taxation which the people were bearing, it was important that the restriction should be placed. My friend did not think it proper to change the rule of the House which gives that power in an appropriation bill, the only effective bill that comes before Congress for the reduction of expenditures.

Mr. BLAINE. Allow me a moment?
Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. I said then, and I said in the committee-room this year, as the honorable gentleman who now occupies the chair, [Mr. Cox, ] as well as the Speaker of the House, will bear me out, that that rule to which the gentleman has adverted was in my judgment a bad rule, and the amendment was an equally bad rule; and I will tell you why.

Under the rule now you can get any subject under the canopy of heaven introduced into an appropriation bill if you only label it retrenchment, and the moment you get it in an appropriation bill with all the chances coming from what the Senate may put on and what conference committees may get into the bills in the closing hours of the session, I tell the gentleman he has involved everything in uncertainty. I tell the gentleman it is a Trojan horse he has got into the administration of the House, and he will live long enough to see that I am speaking the sober truth when I tell him that in correcting a

Now, sir, while I am up, the gentleman from Indiana, who has called me into this debate, in which I had no purpose of participating, will allow me to make a little point upon the bill. The gentleman has referred to the fact of salaries being established by the demoeratic party before the republicans came into power. Well, sir, there was a series of salaries established at that time by various bills and measures, and among them by the measure of Mr. R. M. T. Hunter, whose bill established the salaries of the lower grades of clerks of the first, second, third, and fourth class. Now the gentleman proposes to take 10 per cent. off from those salaries.

At the time that limit of salaries was made for the clerks the democratic Congress fixed its own salary at $3,000.

Now, we have since then advanced our own salaries 60 per cent., and they stand to-day at $5,000 a year; whereas these poor clerks who work their finger-ends off have not had their salaries advanced a particle, not a dollar. Now you come in here and propose to mislead the country and praise yourself on account of submitting your own salaries to the same shaving and discounting that you put upon others. You take 10 per cent. off the salaries of members of Congress after they have been advanced 60 per cent., and then take 10 per cent. off want the gentleman to answer that point.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will try to do so.

Mr. BLAINE. One moment further.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman has stated his point very well, and will answer it.

Mr. BLAINE. Put your salaries as members of Congress, if you are sincere, back to the same grade that it was when the salaries of the clerks were established, and then put on your planing-machine of 10 per cent. and go before the country honestly.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman has spoken very well, and I shall very fully agree with him on that subject.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well; I will support your motion if you will submit it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman cannot expect by this little speech, although it is a very good one, to prevent my recurring again to the other question. He says that the present rule will be found to be a grievous rule, a grievous mistake. Now let us see. The rule as administered by my friend for six long years, during all of which time he was chairman of the Committee on Rules, was this, that upon an appropriation bill you might increase a salary. And day by day, just as remorseless as the movements of time, measures were brought into this House to increase salaries. There is the ground of the inequali-ties of which the gentleman complains. When you apply the plane and reduce salaries 10 per cent. or 20 per cent., then the marvelous inequality of the old rule begins to make itself apparent. The salaries of your favorites grew up in monstrous proportions, while the salaries of others remained untouched. But according to the gentleman from Maine that was not a grievous rule which allowed unlimited raids upon the Treasury in the way of increase of salaries.

Mr. BLAINE. O, yes; it was a bad rule.
Mr. HOLMAN. That was a bad rule?
Mr. BEAINE. Yes; it was a bad rule.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me—
Mr. HOLMAN. In one moment. Will my friend from Maine, who says that the present rule is a grievous rule, and that the old rule was also a bad one, explain how it was that, with almost absolute power in regard to the administration of this House—for the gentleman's ability and experience made him complete master of the situationwill the gentleman tell how it was that that grievous error in the rules which enabled the running up of salaries in this House day by day was never sought to be reformed? But when we turn it right over, then we hear for the first time from the gentleman from Maine that this new rule is a grievous rule, just as was the old one. The present rule is a rule in the interest of economy and of the people. The old rule was one in the interest of a remorseless series of meas-Ine old rule was one in the interest of a remorseless series of measures by which the salaries of Government officials were increased.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman permit me—
Mr. HOLMAN. For a question only.
Mr. BLAINE. Does not the gentleman see the difference?
Mr. HOLMAN. I do see the difference.
Mr. BLAINE. I want to sale a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do see the difference.
Mr. BLAINE. I want to ask a question.
Mr. HOLMAN. My friend behind me from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] is entitled to the floor.
Mr. BLAINE. I was asking the gentleman if he could not see the difference

Mr. HOLMAN. I do see the difference, certainly; I answer the question without a moment's hesitation; there is a very striking difference. The one rule enabled the gentlemen here and in the other end of the Capitol to reward their friends with increased facilities for reaching into the Treasury, while the other rule, that adopted by this House, enables us, on the only bills which must certainly pass both branches of Congress, the appropriation bills, to cure the evils under which we have so long labored.

Mr. BLAINE. That remains to be seen. The gentleman will ob-

Mr. HOLMAN. The one is a measure of profligacy, the other a measure of economy. That is the difference; I can see it in a mo-

Mr. BLAINE. If the gentleman—
Mr. HOLMAN. I have not time now to yield.
Mr. BLAINE. Of course, after the gentleman has entirely misstated me

Mr. HOLMAN. For a question only.
Mr. BLAINE. Does the gentleman yield to me for two minutes?
Mr. HOLMAN. For a question.
Mr. BLAINE. I want—
Mr. HOLMAN. My friend can get the same of the Mr. BLAINE. I have not obtained the floor this session by courtesy; I have obtained it only where I was entitled to it by the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLAINE. The rule to which the gentleman refers, which was an old rule and came down to us from a democratic régime, yet which he says I was answerable for not changing, the rule which I enforced, was a rule which belonged to the Committee of the Whole, with which the Speaker of the House had as little or less to do than any other member of the House. Yet he holds me responsible for not seeking to change that rule. Sir, why not hold your honorable self responsible [referring to the Chairman, Mr. Cox,] whom, from your long experience and great knowledge of parliamentary proceedings, I called to my aid as an associate member of the Committee on Rules. And to my aid as an associate member of the Committee on Rules. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Randall,] chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, was also on that committee. Did the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Randall] present this rule as a grievance then? Now that rule, Mr. Chairman, only permitted a single application to salaries. The rule you have now permits any subject of legislation, no matter how wild or how foreign, to be introduced into an appropriation bill, provided it has the delusive term retrenchment attached to it and therefore when that rule was adopted you transferred the it, and therefore when that rule was adopted you transferred the whole legislative powers of the House to the room of the Committee on Appropriations. And you will find in the workings of the rule all the evils which existed under the old law and a thousand more that under that rule had never been dreamed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend, perhaps, is good at prophecy, but it may be that that is the only thing that will commend him in his answer. He prophesies that this rule, adopted in the interests of economy, will work badly. We shall see.

Mr. BLAINE. We shall see.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems now that the present Committee on Appropriations are to be held responsible during the last six years for not changing the rule. Mr. BLAINE. They

Mr. BLAINE. They never proposed it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Never proposed it! Why, the gentleman is certainly mistaken. I had the same rule, which is now the rule of the House in terms, before that committee during the whole of the last Congress. Does my friend say that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] called it to the attention of the Committee on Rules?

Mr. BLAINE. Never that I remember. Never.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, it was read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BLAINE. O, there of course, but I say that neither of the members of the Committee on Rules ever proposed that the committee should report it has a favorable to the House.

tee should report it back favorably to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend seems to think that the old rule was rievous because it enabled Congress to increase expenditures, and the other rule was grievous because it enables Congress to reduce expenditures.

But, Mr. Chairman, I cannot leave this subject without expressing But, Mr. Chairman, I cannot leave this subject without expressing astonishment that the gentleman attempts to escape from this dilemma by saying that he had nothing to do with the Committee of the Whole. It is the House that adopts the rules of the Committee of the Whole. Does the gentleman intend to say to the country that the Committee of the Whole adopts rules?

Mr. BLAINE. No; but the gentleman said I enforced the rule, and I called his straight that the Committee of the Whole adopts rules?

I called his attention to the fact that it was the chairman of the Committee of the Whole that enforced this rule, not the Speaker.

Mr. HOLMAN. But certainly the chairman of the Committee of the Whole adopted the rules, whatever they might be, as announced by the gentleman from Maine as Speaker of the House. That was inevitable

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman must not make a little point upon that. If he saw such grievous propositions in the rule as he now pretends, why did he not on a Monday or at any other time propose to change it? He sat here fourteen years under it, and never made any such proposition. This whole thing is pitiful; it is trifling.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no! my friend is greatly mistaken about that. By his own rule it required a majority of the House to second the motion to suspend the rules. Did any gentleman on this side of the House while that rule was in force over got a majority to second. House, while that rule was in force, ever get a majority to second a motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. BLAINE. How long was that rule in force?
Mr. HOLMAN. During the larger portion of an entire Congress.
Mr. BLAINE. But you were here seven Congresses, in all twelve

Mr. BLAINE. But you were need seven congresses, in an entire years, before that rule was in force.

Mr. HOLMAN. And over and over and over again I protested against this rule without power to change it. But there is one fact which the gentleman must bear in mind, and I will put it on record. Let him say what he pleases about the gentlemen who have come into this Hall and now constitute the majority, the fact cannot be concealed that whether we acquiesced or not during those fourteen years, the moment we had the power to change that rule we said that the rules of this House should be administered in the interest of economy and not of extravagance in the Government, and we did it over my friend's protest. And when the natural force of the new rule begins friend's protest. And when the natural force of the new rule begins to appear, when we bring in bills proposing to reduce the expenditures of the Government, it is not marvelous that indirectly—not with very great directness—an effort is made to destroy the bill by assaults upon it.

Mr. BLAINE. I want you to be consistent on salaries of members of Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; I shall be entirely consistent.
The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. Cox.) Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to be interrupted further?
Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think I will be interrupted any further.

[Laughter.] I say this seriously, for I do not expect to discuss the subject in a vein that will excite criticism.

subject in a vein that will excite criticism.

My friend threatens that if we reduce these salaries which had grown out of all proportion too large when you first came into power, (and I hear yet the ringing voice of gentlemen on that side of the House denouncing salaries sixteen years ago,) if we persist in reducing these salaries to what is fair and reasonable, to prices beginning to approach those which are realized in private employment, we are told as a mode of deterring us, if possible, that we shall be placed in the position of being compelled to reduce our own salary. Why, sir, the gentleman from Maine has not read the history of the democratic party aright, if he thinks that an intimation like that will affect our action. He must live very remote from the democratic element, and must be He must live very remote from the democratic element, and must be exceedingly uninformed of the democratic spirit, if he supposes that exceedingly uninformed of the democratic spirit, if he supposes that reducing salaries down to the standard of the olden time—that democratic time if you please, (and I do not desire to discuss a subject like this in a partisan spirit,)—will deter any democrat on this floor or elsewhere from demanding that there shall be retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] says that if we go beyond 1860 in reducing salaries (and we go beyond 1860 as to very few salaries, indeed most of them have been increased since 1860) there must be a heavy raduction in the pays of morphory of the House and Senate.

be a heavy reduction in the pay of members of the House and Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him? He certainly knows that a large majority of the salaries reduced are of those fixed prior to 1860—the salaries of the first, second, third, and fourth class clerks and the chiefs of divisions.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend is a frank, fair, and honorable gentleman; but he fails to present the fact.

Mr. FOSTER. Is not that the fact?

Mr. HOLMAN. The fact is simply this: When you fixed those salaries at $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, and $1,800, you fixed classifications that embraced almost all the employes in the Departments except that embraced almost all the employes in the Departments except the heads of the Departments and the heads of a few Bureaus. You had your Auditors and your Comptrollers; you had the heads of your Departments; you had a few heads of Bureaus; but the great body of your employés in the Departments were embraced within those four classes. How is it now? Does not my friend know that under that order of things the salaries I have been mentioning—those of the deputy first comptroller and the deputy second comptroller—would have been $2,000? That was the highest.

Why even now in this bill we give $2,600 to each deputy comptrol.

Why, even now in this bill we give $2,600 to each deputy comptroller, which under that classification would be only $2,000. All the way through you have a class of clerks at $2,000, another class at $2,500, another class at $2,500, and the deputy comptrollers, who are but a class of clerks, at $2,600.

When my friend talks about going back to 1853, to the Hunter bill, for the purpose of seeking a classification and reducing that classification, he does himself absolute injustice. Now the range is from $1,200, and we do not touch the lowest, to $2,600. The range of democratic salaries was from $1,200 to $1,800, with few exceptional cases of clerks who received $2,000. I can count those who received more than $1,800 on the fingers of one of my hands.

Mr. BLAINE. Why did you not leave the $1,800 where they are?

My friend did not mention that.

Mr. HOLMAN. We did not deem it necessary to make an intermediate class of clerks. Instead of what it was under the old administration of affairs, from $1,200 to $2,600. We have to leave them there. If we had come in with a bill bringing salaries down to the olden time, when there was no ground of feeling that republicanism would perish from the face of the earth in consequence of growing venality in public affairs—if we went back to that olden time, this bill would be reduced $1,000,000 more. We are acting slowly. We understood we had a delicate task on our hands in reducing the expenses of this Government as far as they might be, and yet not give just ground of complaint on the part of any gentleman connected with the administration of the Govern-ment. We cannot afford, on the ground of patriotic sense of duty on the one hand, or policy on the other—we cannot afford, I say, to reduce these salaries now as they ought to be reduced, for we cannot afford this country should even have a suspicion that the democratic majority of this House would reduce salaries so as to embarrass any Bureau of the Government. No, sir; we have sought to reduce as far as we might for the present year and not as far as may be done next year, for next year the Departments will have accustomed themselves to a body of clerks who will comport well with the duties to be performed. You cannot do this all at once. You cannot come down at once from the extravagance of war times to the severe economy of a time of peace. We must reduce expenses as far as we can, and yet leave no Department of the Government in any of its branches with the shadow of a ground for complaint.

Now, as to the pay of members of Congress. This bill proposes to reduce that pay from $5,000 to $4,500, leaving the mileage as now fixed by law. The gentleman from Ohio suggests that if other salaries are reduced to what they were prior to 1860, we should go back to that time in applying the 10 per cent. rule here. I have attempted to show the injustice of that upon the ground of the different classification of clerks under the old order of things. I will say, however, to the gentleman that in my judgment the pay of members can be reduced lower than what is now proposed.

The party responsible for the administration of this House have The party responsible for the administration of this House have not increased salaries so far as this body is concerned. The increase of salaries of 1854-755 or 1855-756 from $3 a day to $3,000 a year was when the democratic party was in a minority in this House. When the increase occurred in 1866 from $3,000 a year to the present salary of $5,000 the democratic party was in the minority in this House. As a minority and as a party they have never increased the pay of members of Congress beyond $8 a day during the session of Congress. The gentleman deems it probable they have resisted an attempt to further reduce the expenses of the Government for fear they will be put in the position of reducing their own salaries.

put in the position of reducing their own salaries.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend labors under a grievous mistake, for he would not go as far as some would go on this side in reducing salaries, providing he leaves the salary sufficient to meet the reasonable expenses of a member of Congress during the time he was employed in the public service. I lay down for myself but one rule, the rule of the olden time; that a citizen in public employ should receive the same compensation substantially he would receive if he discharged the same service with the same integrity and competency in a private the same service with the same integrity and competency in a private employment. Is not that a sound rule? Will gentlemen tell me why employment. Is not that a sound rule? Will gentlemen tell me why this Government should pay its employes higher wages than they get, having the same integrity and ability, in other employments?

Mr. FOSTER. Right there let me ask the gentleman a question. Why does he then oppose the reduction of the pay of laborers? He knows that the pay of laborers in the employment of the Government is largely in excess of what private employers pay.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not see exactly the object of my friend's exception.

Mr. BLAINE. If I do not interrupt the gentleman, while he is collecting his thoughts upon that point, I ask him to yield to me for a

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will excuse me. I prefer to go on just now. There are certain laborers in this Government receiving $720 a year. Does the gentleman from Ohio favor reducing those sal-

Mr. FOSTER. I asked the gentleman a question, and I wish an answer to that question before he proceeds to catechise me. It is well known that the gentleman from Indiana opposes the reduction of the salaries of these laborers. He announces as a principle that he favors a reduction of all salaries to the prices that private employers pay. Now, we pay these laborers—
Mr. HOLMAN. I do not yield to my friend for a speech. I merely yield for a question.

Mr. FOSTER. I have asked the question, and it has not been an-

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend almost places me in the position of my friend from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who, when somebody tried to get him down below a certain point, said he could not go below a dime. When my friend from Ohio in this indirect manner attempts to arraign before the country a salary of $720 that you pay to employés of your Departments

Mr. FOSTER. I do not arraign it. Mr. HOLMAN. He endeavors to create a prejudice against it, and says we ought to reduce it.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not in favor of that reduction.
Mr. HOLMAN. Then why do you mention it?
Mr. FOSTER. Because on the principle on which you are acting you ought to reduce those salaries, and yet you do not favor that re-

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend, I think, is not as frank as he ought to be on this point. Why bring up those salaries? Why not let them alone? I am not in favor of reducing them, I admit. I will apply the rule, however, of my friend which I have mentioned; I will apply it to all employes of this Government who receive large compensations. And I will say to my friend further that there are many labor-ing men in this country who are receiving $720 a year. I do not know that that is an extravagant salary.

Mr. FOSTER. For six hours' work?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think that it is a salary that ought to be complained of. And I must insist that my friend shall not place himself in a false position. I know that he would not reduce those salaries, and yet by his line of argument he would seem to intimate that even these lower salaries should be reduced.

Mr. FOSTER. What about the charwomen?

Mr. HOLMAN. O! I stand by the charwomen.

Mr. HOLMAN. O! I stand by the charwomen.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say that he cannot protect the gentleman from Indiana in his right to the floor unless he refuses to yield.

Mr. HOLMAN. I cannot refuse to yield.

Mr. BLAINE. Knowing how good-natured my friend is, I wish to address to him one question.

address to him one question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not now; let me finish my sentence. There are certain employés we have not touched. We have not touched the employés receiving under $1,200 a year. Gentlemen talk about insufficient salaries, salaries upon which the clerks cannot live. I have heard of ladies in this city, the widows of soldiers who fell in your service, with two or three little children, receiving a salary of $900, and supporting themselves and those children, and educating them out of this small salary received from your Government; and yet we hear gentlemen say that $1,200, the lowest salary we fix by this bill for the neophytes in your Departments, is too low.

O, no.
D. Who said that?

Mr. GARFIELD. Who said that?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, sir, these gentlemen are complaining of our classification, and saying that we are going back prior to 1860 and reducing the salaries fixed in democratic times, while they themselves charge, and I felt the truth of the charge at the time, that we are extravagant in the administration of this Government.

Mr. FÖSTER. Will the gentleman allow me— Mr. HOLMAN. Permit me to finish this matter of the compensapay of $3,000, when the cost of living was far beyond what it is now. Nobody then proposed to raise that salary. How could any one propose to raise the salaries of members of Congress at a time when great numbers of our fellow-citizens were receiving thirteen or sixteen dollars a month and imperiling themselves in the public employment for which that salary was paid? At such a time this House had not the hardihood to propose an increase of salaries beyond the $3,000. On the termination of the war, when it was reasonably certain that the cost of living would diminish as the elements of circulation would evidently be largely contracted from time to time, then the movement was set on foot to increase the pay of members of Congress up to $5.000 a year. gress up to $5,000 a year.

I have always felt that the salary which was deemed sufficient, which was sufficient during that period of the war was not too low a salary; that it was a reasonable salary for that period; and that, if any change were made from the salary fixed in 1854-755 or 1855-756, it should have been to have gone back in view of the privations the people were called upon to endure rather than the amount of their compensation should be increased.

Here the hammer fell. ]

[Here the hammer fell.]
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's hour has expired.
Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the House to allow me just a few moments, inasmuch as I was interrupted all the way through.
Mr. BLAINE. I want the gentleman to yield to me for a moment. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.
Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Maine in a moment if he will allow me first to finish what I have to say.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the gentleman from Indiana proceeding? [Cries of "No!" "No!" and "Go on!"]
Mr. HOLMAN. I will close what I was attempting to say by simply this statement: That this question of salary, which is one that influences the destinies of this Government of ours, rises far above any mere personal considerations. In my judgment, this House can afford to reduce the salaries of members of Congress to a rate of compensation corresponding with the diminished expenses of living, and pensation corresponding with the diminished expenses of living, and also the diminished ability of the country to pay salaries ought to be taken into account.

I shall co-operate most cheerfully with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] on any reasonable basis they may suggest in favor of reducing the salaries of members of Congress to any reasonable degree lower than that now fixed by this bill; all I shall ask is this, that you shall not fix the salary so low that a man wealthy only in his capacity to serve the country, and having no other wealth, shall not be driven out of the public employment; but I know that, if you put the salary at $3,000, or even less, you will not drive out of public employment those who desire public employment with one single purpose in view, to serve the best interests of their country to the best of their ability without any self-seeking or desire beyond the welfare of the country.

These considerations in favor of this bill are of a character, if gentlemen will permit me to say so, that do not admit of the petty comreasonable basis they may suggest in favor of reducing the salaries tlemen will permit me to say so, that do not admit of the petty com-parisons that have been indulged in. We have reached a point when no friend of the country will insist on unimportant details as to comparative rates of salary. You have got, sir, a point to aim at far beyond that. No citizen can have watched the progress of events during the years since the close of the civil war when the extravagance of the Government fairly began without knowing—for it has been patent to his eyes and has fallen on his ear from every direction—that if free government is to be maintained in this country, if these free institutions of which our fathers were so proud themselves and our own glories are to be maintained, you have to get rid in public employment of the incentives to venality.

The evil which now assails this Government and imperils it is verality in public employés. It walks our streets in the glare of noon-day; it displays itself everywhere, in every field of public employment. The millions of dollars appropriated from the public Treasury annually, millions beyond what a frugal administration of our affairs requires, have bred a spirit of venality in our public employés absolutely imperiling the free institutions of this country. It is perhaps almost an inevitable outgrowth to some extent of the war. After the almost an inevitable outgrowth to some extent of the war. After the war closed new impulses had been given; and that up to this time, after eight years, no earnest or persistent effort had been made to check this growing evil, is one of the things that cannot be well understood. Public indignation moves slowly; but now, after a well-defined expression of public feeling, the representatives of the popular will begin to speak and begin to act. O, no, sir; this is not a question of a salary of $800, or $1,200, or $1,400, or $1,600, or $2,600, but it is a question that lies at the very foundation of our Government. Shall there be purity in the administration of our public affairs? Shall there be be purity in the administration of our public alians; shall there be honesty in the Government? Does any gentleman, looking the subject fairly in the face, indulge the hope that you shall year after year make vast appropriations of money beyond the necessities of the Government and still have your Departments administered with purity and integrity? O, no! O, no! It cannot be hoped.

You have got to go far beyond in what will be necessary in retrenching now than you would have had to do if the work had been begun immediately after the close of the war. If at that time, instead of giving an impulse to increase of salaries, an attempt had been made at once to reduce the expenditures in every Department of the Government, we would not to-day have had the melancholy spectacle of our counwe would not to-day have had the melancholy spectacle of our country mortified and blushing as a nation for the absence of integrity in the administration of its affairs. We would have escaped all that. And here let me say to gentlemen that this is a subject that party has nothing to do with. When we shall have all been gathered to our fathers and the memory of most of us shall have passed away, the question on which we deliberate to-day will be in its effects absolutely fatal to this nation if we are now recessant to our data. But solutely fatal to this nation if we are now recreant to our duty. But if there shall be an earnest and persistent effort, overriding all quibbles and pretexts, to reduce the expenditures of the Government and diminish the drain upon our Treasury, we may indulge the hope that many long years will elapse before the fatal experience of this hour will again be encountered by the people of this country. If we do not do this; if we pass on in the old channels, and if the people do not most signally rebuke us, then no man looking to the future can anticipate what must be its final effect on the destinies of the country. It is venality in public employment that the people of this Government have to apprehend. If our Government is to remain a Republic it must be so because administered in honesty and integrity with every motive under heaven to produce such results, and none to produce contrary results.

I say, therefore, in regard to this bill, striking as it does at individual salaries, at the salaries of our friends in this House, at the salaries of your friends in the Departments, if there is not enough virtue now here to enable members to rise up above these personal considerations and look alone to the public interest and the public welfare, and to reduce the expenditures of this Government so far as they are involved in this bill, to the amount and to the point that are demanded by simple frugal economy, and nothing more, we will, so far as our action in this Congress is concerned, add to the perils to which this nation is exposed the further peril that the very fountains of justice and of law will be corrupted by the venality which we permit to be introduced into our affairs through the volume of appropriations made by these bills.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.
Mr. BLAINE. I will detain the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Scales] but a few minutes. I merely want to make a correction in regard to some matters which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has brought into this debate—and I desire his attention while I do so-in regard to the rule upon which he has seen fit to comment, in connection with my occupancy of the Speaker's chair. I propose to give the history of that rule.

On the 14th of September, 1837, the House adopted this rule:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in der as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by aw.

At the next session of Congress, on the 7th of March, 1838, Mr. C. C. Cambreling, of New York, nomen venerabile, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means at the time, moved an amendment to an appropriation bill increasing the salaries of certain customs officials at Salem, Norfolk, and Charleston. The point of order was made that under the rule it was not competent for him to move that amendment. The point was made by Mr. George N. Briggs, afterward well known as governor of Massachusetts. Mr. Bell, of Tennessee—all of those connected with this matter happen to be well-known and distinguished men—moved an amendment to the rule. The Speaker at the time was James K. Polk, afterward President of the United States, and the Congress was largely democratic. In the United States, and the Congress was largely democratic. In pursuance of that motion of Mr. Bell, one week later an amendment to the rule was reported and adopted in these words:

Unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government.

The rule, as amended, read as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government.

Under that amended rule the amendment proposed to the appropriation bill by Mr. Cambreling became in order. And under that amended rule propositions for increasing salaries have been ruled in order as being of the kind that arose under "the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government." was adopted nearly forty years ago; it has been administered by more democratic Speakers than republican Speakers, and when my honorable friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] fresh and zealous, with that freshness and zeal which are continuous in him, entered the House in freshness and zeal which are continuous in him, entered the House in the Thirty-sixth Congress, he found this rule in force, and that was a strong democratic Congress. And the decision was made—

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me?
Mr. BLAINE. Wait a moment, and then I will. The decision was made that the change in the rule was for the very purpose of permitting amendments to increase salaries.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me a question.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, in a moment. The gentleman was in the Thirty-seventh Congress, and in the Thirty-eighth Congress, and I sat with him in that Congress. The gentleman was a venerable member when I entered Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, very.

Mr. BLAINE. And now he says that the reason he did not move to change the rule was that we had a rule here which required a seconding before a motion to suspend the rules could be voted upon. Sir, that rule was in force here only a part of one Congress, and the gentleman has sat here fourteen years

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not give that as a reason; I said it was the act. I had no reason—

Mr. BLAINE. I see the gentleman had no reason to give.
Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will find my record all right.
Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman will observe that this amended rule was adopted by a democratic Congress at the instance of one of the most illustrious members of the democratic party, Mr. Cambreling, and under one of the most illustrious democratic Speakers, James K Polk. It was administered for twenty-two consecutive years under democratic Speakers and in democratic Houses; and the gentleman says now that I am responsible for this rule. Sir, I inherited, when I entered that chair, a body of rules—

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me—

Mr. BLAINE. Wait a moment. I inherited a body of rules to administer, and I endeavored to administer them in good faith. I was minister, and I endeavored to administer them in good faith. I was no more responsible for a change in these rules than any other member on this floor; not one particle. I was not seated in that chair to make rules; I was seated there by the partiality of my party friends to administer the rules which were then in force. It was for the House to make rules. By the rules I was made chairman of the Committee on Rules, to which such subjects were to be referred.

Now, when the gentleman attempts to put upon me the responsibility of an old, time-honored, time-worn democratic rule, I think he is forgetting a little of that fairness which is a part of his nature. The gentleman and I have been old associates here, and it would take a great deal to make us have any difference except of a friendly character. I am sure he will see that in his zeal for economy, which I shall endeavor to second to the best of my ability, he did me injustice.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Maine may examine carefully the record of the Thirty-sixth Congress, and he will find no instance the record of the Thirty-sixth Congress, and he will find no instance in which the rule recently rescinded by this House was appealed to for the purpose of increasing salaries. He says it was a democratic rule. Without discussing that subject, I will say—

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend will allow me to say that it was in that very Congress that the gradation of salaries at $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, and $1,800 was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no, no, no.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly it was.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; they were fixed by law.

Mr. GARFIELD. But the law was made then.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] served for many years upon the Committee on Appropriations; and it is strange that he should fall into such an error as that.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is no error.

that he should fall into such an error as that.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is no error.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly it is an error. Why, sir, the young men who are coming into public life will laugh at both my friend and myself if we exhibit such want of information as to legislative history.

The "Hunter bill," as it was called, fixed the gradations of salaries at $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, and $1,800. It was done not by an appropriation bill, but by law. Now I wish to say—and I want the attention of the gentleman from Maine still further-I have heard that interpretation of the rule of late years—
Mr. BLAINE. The rule was declared to have been framed for that very purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have seen the statement which my friend has read; but I would like him to find an instance in the Thirty-sixth Congress where that rule was appealed to on an appropriation bill to increase a salary. Let me go further. Take that period of time when the party represented on the other side of the House still remembered the rock from whence it was hewn and the principles on which it came into power—retrenchment and reform; take the Thirtyseventh Congress, and let the gentleman point me to a single instance where that rule was seized upon to increase a salary on an appropriawhere that rule was serzed upon to increase a satary on an appropria-tion bill. Let him come down to the Thirty-eighth Congress and point to an instance of that kind. It is possible there may be such; but I almost venture the assertion, (for I have watched the course of legislation closely,) that up to the close of the Thirty-eighth Congress the gentleman has before him the only instance where that rule was appealed to or made use of for the purpose of increasing a salary. He may come down to the year 1836 without finding another such instance. The year 1836 was the unfortunate beginning of the era of extravagance in which we live. It was then that the rule came into requisition; it was then that that interpretation of the rule became prominent; and from that day to this these remorseless bills have grown upon our hands, these salaries have been vastly increased, this cupidity has pervaded every branch of the public service, until the nation now blushes for the record which Congress has made in this direction. And it was inevitable. Yet my friend from Maine thinks the reversal of that rule—the striking down of that rule as soon as we had the power to strike it down—was a mistake.

Mr. BLAINE. On the Lididact say that I lead you ought to have

Mr. BLAINE. O, no. I did not say that. I said you ought to have struck out that rule, but not put this in. That is what I moved in the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood the gentleman to say that it was an egregious error. Mr. BLAINE.

Mr. BLAINE. To put your rule in. And I say so now.
Mr. HOLMAN. Yet it was that rule which facilitated and made possible measures which bring the blush to the cheek of this nation to-day. Purity in government, honest administration of your affairs, was not to be expected when the rules of Congress were so interpreted as to encourage extravagant appropriations.

Mr. BLAINE. Your rule opens the door just as wide for abuses as the old rule did. It does more; it enables every conceivable piece of legislation to be brought in as a rider upon appropriation bills. The gentleman, as an old parliamentarian, knows that one of the evils that have come down to us from the experience of the British House of Commons, one that almost every State Legislature finds it necessary to guard against, one that we are warned against at the very threshold of our business here, is to keep general legislation off your appropriation bills. Now, the rule which the gentleman has put into our book, (while I have no doubt that in its motive it was just as pure and equitable as it could be,) opens the door to all manner and measure of abuse. The gentleman says that it was a considerable time before the old rule bore its full fruit of evil. This new rule which the gentleman has introduced may, like a new broom, sweep clean for a time; but I tell him, with some little experience in this matter—and he has even more than I—that, unless I entirely mistake the tendency and operation of rules of this kind, this will ultimately open the door to immeasurable abuses which the other was not competent the door to inflict. The old rule was limited to an increase of salaries. By the operation of this rule, under the idea of retrenching salaries, you may have all imaginable vicious legislation affecting the rights of the people, changing radically the laws of the country, interfering with every possible human right that may be reached by congressional enactment. Every conceivable measure of that kind may be piled upon an appropriation bill; and under the thumb-screw, under the pressure that attends legislation on appropriation bills, you thus force through Congress what in its calmer moments, upon the reports of appropriate committees, would never even get a respectable hearing in this House.

In that view I think the rule is utterly vicious.

Mr. HOLMAN. The new rule allows an amendment to an appropriation bill if germane to the subject-matter, or to change existing law if it retrench expenditures. There are two features; first it must be germane, and secondly it must retrench expenditures of the Government. Does not the gentleman from Maine well know that no citizen, no matter what other claim he might have for a seat as presiding officer of this House, would ever occupy that position and be willing in the very face of the people of this country to interpret that rule contrary to its express language. It must retrench expenditure and it must be germane to the subject-matter of the bill. Why talk about opening up this wide field! These monuments placed on each side opening up this wide held! These monuments placed on each side of that rule are too plain to be mistaken. It must be germane to the subject-matter of the bill and it must retrench expenditure. Peril there to the Government! Peril under that rule when within the restraints which itself provides it is within the control of the House! No; my friend falls into a mistake. He would never have dared to place the construction he did on that rule had he not found ancient precedent; and no man occupying that chair looking this House in the face, looking the people of the country in the face, would ever dare to place a construction on this rule which would violate those conditions, first that it should be germane to the subject of the bill, conditions, first that it should be germane to the subject of the bill, and secondly that it shall retrench expenditure. With these safe-guards the gentleman from Maine regards this as less safe than one which literally opens your Treasury, absolutely throws it open to the impulse of Congress in passing great appropriation bills! A rule which shuts up the Treasury, according to my friend from Maine, which shuts it up and puts guards around it, is more perilous than one to throw it wide over the court involve of this Honey when consider to throw it wide open to every impulse of this House when considering an appropriation bill.

One word more and I am through.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to call your attention to a point before you sit down.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will say from the first hour—and the gentleman from Maine will confirm what I state so far as I am concerned, although of insignificant moment except to myself-that from the time that rule came to be first in active operation, when attempts were made time and again upon this floor to increase salaries beyond what was reasonable, I opposed it in every possible way; and the very moment there was an opportunity to secure its reversal, I took that step. The gentleman from Maine, with his experience in the administration of the House, may have deemed the old rule the safer one; but in my judgment it was a rule full of peril, while the present rule will be found one of economy, one promotive of honesty in the Government.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire the gentleman to allow me to call his attention-

Mr. SCALES. I think I have the right to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield the

Mr. HOLMAN. I do. If the gentleman from Ohio desires to be heard, I hope the House will not refuse him the opportunity.

Mr. SCALES. I yielded the floor for one minute at the beginning of this discussion, and now all I have to say is that if gentlemen did more in observing the rules and less in talking about them, we would get along much better. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CALDWELL.]

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. Blackburn having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Cox reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution Ordered, That the petition of James E. Slaughter, of Alabama, asking for the removal of his disabilities, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the morning hour has expired, and the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 1) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vicevide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the absence of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. Morton,] I suggest that the Calendar be proceeded with in order, commencing at the place where we last left off.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. For unobjected cases, the Senator means?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly. We ought not to proceed with the bill in the absence of the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Calendar will be taken up and unobjected cases considered.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 23) for the relief of Edwin Fairfax Gray, reported adversely from the Committee on of Edwin Fairfax Gray, reported adversely from the Committee on

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] is not in his seat, and I desire that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

HEIRS OF MAJOR D. C. SMITH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 548) for the relief of the heirs of Major D. C. Smith; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It relieves the heirs and bondsmen of Major D. C. Smith, late assistant paymaster of the United States Army, from the payment of $166.39, and the interest thereon, as appears due upon settlement of his accounts.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out, in line 6, the words "39" before "cents," and insert "29," so as to read:

From the payment of the sum of $166.29.

The amendment was agreed to. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report in the case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. Cock-

RELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, March 13:

RELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, March 13:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 548) for the relief of the heirs of Major D. C. Smith, have duly considered the same, and submit the following report:

Major D. C. Smith was a paymaster in the United States Army; was a gallant, efficient, and meritorious officer. On October 27, 1864, Major D. C. Smith, in company with several other paymasters, left Memphis, Tennessee, on board of the steamer Belle of Saint Louis for Saint Louis. At Randolph, Tennessee, this steamer started to land and was boarded by some eight or ten guerrillas, while others from the shore began firing into the steamer. The guerrillas on board undertook to force the engineer and officers of the boat to land.

Majors Buler and D. C. Smith took their revolvers and approached the guerrillas on board and began to fire and were fired upon, and Major Smith was mortally wounded and died; Major Buler was also mortally wounded. Their gallant conduct enabled the steamer to be saved, and thus the Government property on board the steamer was also saved. Paymaster-General Alvord reports the accounts of Major D. C. Smith as follows, to wit:

His final accounts show that at the date of his death he was indebted to

"I inclose a copy of his chief paymaster's report, showing the very gallant manner in which he met his death defending the property of the United States. I therefore most cheerfully recommend the passage of this bill as amended, as I consider it a very just and meritorious one."

The amendment suggested is to strike out "30" and insert "20;" so that the bill as amended will read "$166.29" instead of "$166.39."

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill with the amendment suggested.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is a very small bill of course, but I should like to ask the Senator who reported it on what principle the bill stands. Is it put upon the ground that this officer lost this money in consequence of his being killed in that engagement, or is it put upon the ground that it is a recognition of his meritorious services on that

Mr. COCKRELL. The accounts as made out after the death of Major Smith showed $284.64 in his hands, and then from overadditions $50, making a total of $334.64. He was credited then with his pay, $146.85, and for short additions, which were shown, $21.50, making a total credit of $168.35, leaving a balance of $166.29, which the bill provides his heirs shall be credited with. Had Major Smith been living and able to have made up his accounts and brought forward all the little discrepancies that might have occurred in the small amounts which he had been paying out, the probability is there would have been nothing owing from him. This account was made up after his death by the War Department, and it was considered by the committee that really there was nothing due from his estate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JANE A. HARRIS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1600) granting a pension to Jane A. Harris.

Mr. INGALLS. There is an adverse report in that case, and it should go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

JOHN NEWS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 64) granting the rights and benefits of the Soldiers' Home to John News; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It admits John News to the rights and benefits of the Soldiers' Home if it shall satisfactorily appear to the commissioners that he has not incurred any of the disqualifications named in section 4822 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. SARGENT. I think there ought to be an explanation of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is reported by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Logan,] the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN. There is a report with the joint resolution.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.
The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. A. S.
WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives February 11:

Representatives February 11:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of John News for permission to enter the Soldiers' Home near Washington, District of Columbia, having considered the same, respectfully report:

That it appears from the records of the War Department that said News served in the United States Army for fourteen years, in four several enlistments, commencing August 12, 1851, and was discharged by the War Department, at his own request, August 12, 1874. It also appears from the records of the Navy Department that said News served in the United States Marine Corps eight years, in two enlistments of four years each, making his whole period of service in the Army and Navy about twenty-two years.

By the act of March 3, 1851, an honest and faithful service of twenty years in the Army is made a preliminary condition of admission into the Soldiers' Home. Your committee believe that, equitably, the case of this old soldier, who served in the two branches of service twenty-two years, comes within the liberal spirit and intent of this law, and is entitled to the benefits of the Soldiers' Home. They therefore unanimously recommend the passage of the accompanying joint resolution.

Mr. LOGAN. The whole case is set forth in the report.

Mr. LOGAN. The whole case is set forth in the report.

Mr. SARGENT. That is satisfactory to me.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRUSTEES OF ANTIETAM CEMETERY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1231) for the relief of the board of trustees of the Antietam national cemetery, reported adversely from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being an adverse report in this case, the bill will be passed over.

ARSENAL AT STONINGTON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2143) for the sale of the arsenal and lot at Stonington, Connecticut; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill directs the Secretary of War to sell for cash, after such advertisement as he may deem necessary, either by public auction or by inviting proposals for the purchase thereof, and in either case to the highest responsible bidder, a certain lot and parcel of land, with the buildings thereon, in the town of Stonington, Connecticut, belong-ing to the United States, formerly used for arsenal purposes. On receiving the purchase-money in full he is to execute the necessary deeds of such property to the purchaser or purchasers thereof, conveying all the right, title, and interest of the United States therein. The proceeds of the sale, after paying the necessary expenses, are upon receipt of the same to be paid by the Secretary of War into

Mr. WITHERS. There is no report accompanying that bill. I would inquire of the Senator who reported the bill whether the Secretary of War has recommended the sale of this property? Mr. LOGAN. I think so. It will be found in the papers. Mr. WITHERS. There is no report accompanying the bill. Mr. LOGAN. It is presented on the recommendation of the Department, the property being useless to the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a manuscript report from the Military Committee of the House of Representatives, which will be read if their he no objection.

be read, if their be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

It appears from the letter of the Secretary of War and accompanying papers (see Executive Document No. 27, first session Forty-fourth Congress) that the Government owns a small brick building, 39 by 26 feet, end to end, and 10 feet high, erected in 1813, and used as an arsenal. The lot on which this building stands is small. This property, which is called an arsenal, has long since ceased to be used by the Government for any purpose, and is no longer needed for military or other public purposes, but is an expense to the Government and a nuisance to the town. The committee therefore concur in the recommendation of the Secretary of War that the property he sold, and accordingly prepart the accompanying bill providing that the property be sold, and accordingly report the accompanying bill providing for the sale of the same.

Mr. LOGAN. If it were not for the necessity of sending the bill back to the House, I would suggest an amendment that the advertising shall not be shorter than a month.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment ought to be made.

Mr. LOGAN. I believe I will move the amendment now, that the advertisement or notice shall be for not less than a month.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the amendment suggested? The Chair hears none; and the amendment is made.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. WHYTE. I call for the regular order of business. The Senator from Indiana is in his seat. The regular order was only postponed temporarily until he should come in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland calls for the regular order, which is the unfinished business of yesterday, being Senate bill No. 1.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of ques tions arising thereon.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to ask Senators to remain here to-day until this bill is disposed of. It has been before the Senate for some time; it is a very important measure, and I hope Senators on this side of the Chamber at least will find it convenient to remain here and dispose of it to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest that the Senator ought to say "to-morrow," because there is some other business that ought to be done to-day on another subject. I would suggest to the Senator to fix to-morrow for disposing of this bill.

Mr. MORTON. I should prefer to have it disposed of to-day, if

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to give notice to the Senate that at the

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to give notice to the Senate that at the earliest moment I shall call up the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill. I propose to do it as soon as this bill is finished.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not be frightened out of its propriety by the supposition that I am about to make another speech on this important subject. Nothing is further from my thoughts. But after the judicial broadside fired into the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] and myself yesterday by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] when, with uplifted hands, in wondering astonishment, he declared that it was past his comprehension how the idea could enter the brain of any man, upon reading the how the idea could enter the brain of any man, upon reading the Constitution as it is, that the duty of counting the presidential vote was lodged with the President of the Senate, I am quite sure the Senate will pardon me if, by one or two quotations, I show them that that idea entered into a brain larger than that of the Senator from Maryland and into heads which have worn the crown of laurel with as much grace and almost as much modesty as the Senator from

I referred, Mr. President, to the views of Chancellor Kent, and for the purpose to which I referred to these views they sustain my posi-tion, which was that, as the Constitution now reads, the President of the Senate is presumed to be the proper party to count the electoral vote; and so in confirmation of that I ask permission to read what was said in 1857 by Mr. Israel Washburn on the floor of the House of Representatives in regard to these views of Chancellor Kent:

I received a letter but a few days ago from a gentleman, eminent for his wisdom and ability, who stated therein that the late Chancellor Kent, of New York, had told him that there was clearly a casus omissus; that there was no power either in the House or Senate, or in a joint convention, to interfere and participate authoritatively in counting and declaring the votes and deciding upon their validity; and he said that the chancellor added that he feared the time might come when the country would be shaken to its center on this point.—Congressional Globe, Thirty-fourth Congress, third session, page 657.

That was the sele purpose for which I referred to the opinion of Chancellor Kent; and he does most positively say that, looking at the Constitution as it is, the authority is lodged with the President of the Senate. So then when the Senator from Ohio said that reading the Constitution as it is it passed his comprehension how it could enter into the brain of any man so to construe it, he failed to remember that it entered into the brain of Chancellor Kent so to construe it.

Nor is that all, Mr. President. Mr. Stuart, of Michigan, who was a prominent lawyer and a most honored member of this body, in this same discussion wherein I before referred to Judge Collamer's view, used these remarks:

I think the law might be made more specific; but I cannot admit that the law can provide for any other counting of the votes under the Constitution, than that they shall be counted by the President of the Senate.—Ibid., page 664.

I disagree, therefore, with the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Thompson] when he supposes this is a count by the Senate. It is a count by the President of the Senate. To secure fairness and accuracy it is a public count before two responsible organized bodies under the Constitution.

And Mr. Benjamin, than whom no better lawyer ever sat within these walls, did not think it was unworthy of consideration, for he laid it down expressly that there ought to be a law-that is in regard to counting the vote not cast upon the day provided by law under the express grant of the Constitution—

There ought to be a law directing that hereafter, when the vote of a State presented for count shall appear to have been given on a day different from that provided by law, it shall be the duty of the President of the Senate not to count that vote.—Ibid., page 665.

Recognizing that the President of the Senate was the proper person to count the vote and no one else. And so Mr. Toucey, of Connecticut, a gentleman who had held the high and honorable position for fourteen or fifteen years of prosecuting officer of the State of Connecticut, called to the Cabinet of Mr. Polk as Attorney-General of the United States, an honored and respected Senator in this body for many years, said:

The whole proceeding of counting is based on the idea merely of disclosing to the public in a safe, authentic way, the actual state of the vote, and when that is ascertained truly, the President who is chosen by that vote is President, let Congress do what it may. * * * And any law of Congress which undertakes by its operation to change the actual result as found upon an inspection of the facts would, so far as it changed or varied the result, be inoperative and of no effect; and hence I say to-day, as I said yesterday, that in my judgment the course of the Presiding Olicer.

Mr. Mason who had counted the vote upon the report of the tellers was entirely correct in the House of Representatives.-Ibid., page 666.

But, Mr. President, to prove that it not only entered into the brains of abler and stronger men than the Senator from Maryland, but had strong argument to sustain the rightfulness of such a lodgment, the Senator from Ohio to the contrary notwithstanding, I wish to go a step further and show that not only was this count the mere dis-closure in the presence of witnesses of the vote of the States and that neither House had anything to do with it, but that it was purely ministerial in its character, and not judicial at all, I wish to cite to this Senate the authority of a man with whom I differed as widely in politics as the poles are far apart, but a man whose talents no fair-minded man could deny, whose legal learning no man truthfully could gainsay, a man who held his seat high in the estimation of our coungainsay, a man who held his seat high in the estimation of our country, and whose memory to-day is as green as the shamrock in the hearts of the republican party of the United States—I refer to Hon. Henry Winter Davis. On page 658 of the volume of the Globe which I have cited will be found what he said in regard to this ministerial duty; and, more than that, while we are on the brink of this precipice which may involve us in trouble, let us listen to his warning note as to the difficulty which may arise by Congress tempering with note as to the difficulty which may arise by Congress tampering with this great question of counting the electoral vote.

In my opinion-

there is no judgment to be passed, either by the Senate or by the House of Representatives, or by the tellers, or by the Speaker of the House.

Every one, except the President of the Senate, is enumerated here by Mr. Davis.

by Mr. Davis.

I think that the Constitution of the United States has defined with perfect precision what we are here to do; and beyond that there is nothing to be done, except on a motion which has not yet been made.

The Constitution says that the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates that are Inid upon your table, as containing the votes of the various States, and the votes shall then be counted. They are to be counted in the presence, not of any joint convention, but of the Senate sitting separately, and of the House sitting separately, as separate Houses. It does not say that any result shall be announced. It does not require any judgment to be declared. It does not confer on either the Senate or the House the power to authorize the President of the Senate to declare who is the President of the United States.

Mr. QUITMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question? Who is to count the votes, and to decide whether a vote is to be counted or not?

Mr. Davis of Maryland. That is the precise point I rose to explain my views upon. The votes are to be "counted," and there the Constitution stops. What do gentlemen mean by the word "counted?" Do gentlemen mean that counting a vote here has the effect of a judgment upon the vote that is counted and admitted, or upon a vote which is not counted and is rejected? Do they mean to say that if a vote were rejected here upon the count by the tellers, or were admitted, it would bind any authority known to the laws of the United States! It is that fertile source of all difficulty, this ambiguity in the phrase we are using. I apprehend that the only purpose of assembling here is to identify the things which are sent here as votes. The act is a ministerial and not a judicial one. Counting or refusing to count has no effect. Whether a vote shall or shall not have the effect of electing a President is, after the mere ministerial act of counting out the things sent here by the various States, referred by the Constitution of the United States to the body that is to elect in the event of a failure of election, and there is no motion that can be made here which can raise this question, unless some gentleman shall rise and move, in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, that the House now proceed to the election of a President; and when that shall have been done, and the question shall have arisen whether the papers laid upon the Speaker's table, identified by their official certificates, counted by the gentlemen who are appointed to count, are legal or illegal, that question the House, and the House alone, have the power to decide; and until we are called upon to decide upon the question whether we shall or shall not elect a President, there is no practical question which can be raised in this House upon which our decision would be final. Although this House should go on and pass separate votes upon every vote before them, I apprehend they would be extra-judicial opinions upon facts which they have no right to pass upon separately, and they can only pass upon them upon the motion or upon the presumption that there is no election; and the only decision this House can come to is whether they will proceed or not now to elect a President. I presume that with reference to the Vice-President exactly the same question devolves upon the state, untrammeled by any count or refusal to count, accepting nothing as the basis of their decision except the papers identified here—identified before

And now, Mr. President, fortified with these views of eminent statesmen, I invoke another fire from the battery of the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I really did not suppose that what I said yesterday would excite the sensitiveness of either of my friends to the extent it has done. I certainly did not intend to wound any-body's sensibilities. I said, and perhaps I ought to apologize for having said, that it did seem strange to me how the idea ever could have entered into anybody's head, looking to the Constitution alone and not at any practice under it, that the President of the Senate was the judge in the case that is supposed by this bill.

Mr. WHYTE. The Senator must not suppose that I ever said he was the judge. Counting the vote, and judging of an election, are different things
